FEBRUARY 15, 2009

Dear Family Member:

Please excuse this form letter. Don't be offended by its impersonal nature.

I am sending you a paper that is also copied onto a thumb drive about our Kennard family ancestors. It is a narrative about where they came from, who they were, where they went, and for the later generations, what they did. It starts with the earliest known Kennard ancestors and goes to the current generations of descendants of John H. and Hattie Brown Kennard, one of my paternal great grandparents.

The first page explains why I wrote this paper. In addition, there is already a well researched and well written narrative paper about my Thomas ancestors. If you want a copy please let me know. There is also a hard bound book about my maternal Stewart ancestors in narrative format. There is nothing, however, that I am aware of, written or published about the Kennards of Grimes County, Texas, other than what is referenced in the paper.

I recognize that people are different, and that you may not have a strong interest in family history. I have no problem, whatsoever, with that. We all have our different interests. I ask that you preserve this paper and the data on the thumb drive, however. You may develop an interest later in your life about family history. More importantly, the reason to preserve this information is for your children and future generations of your descendants. Once this type of information is lost, it is gone forever.

I am also sending you a thumb drive of the paper. I strongly urge you to download the electronic copy onto your main computers and store it there. I recognize that is the way almost everything like this is stored. I have concerns, however, that future generations will not be able to access documents because they are stored on outdated software that can no longer be translated. Accordingly, I request that you maintain the hard copy as well.

If you want to review any of the resource documents referenced in the paper, kindly let me know.

This paper took me a year to complete. I hope you find it worthwhile.

Richard Gary Thomas

KENNARD FAMILY OF GRIMES COUNTY TEXAS

Compiled by Richard Gary Thomas
2018

INTRODUCTION

Why Write A Paper About The Kennards?

During a recent family birthday dinner for my sister with her family, someone asked me what I had been doing. I responded that I was writing about the Kennard part of our family. One of my nieces asked, "Why the Kennards?" Boy, did that surprise me. The reason was so fundamental to me that I struggled to explain it.

My niece grew up in Ft. Worth, Texas. She had a close relationship with my mother and heard many stories about my father, both of whom my niece knew as Thomas'. My niece quite often visited my mother in Navasota, Texas, but there were no Kennards in Navasota. They all lived in Anderson, Texas, 10 miles east of Navasota.

On occasion, my sister took her children to Anderson, Texas where they likely visited our aunt and uncle, but those visits were relatively short, and likely did not include any time with people with the last name "Kennard." In light of that background, her question was entirely reasonable. She never knew or had any kind of meaningful relationship with any Kennards. What a surprise! There is someone in my family who never really knew any Kennards.

That made me realize that all of my children and grandchildren would have the same question. In fact, so would all my relatives after my generation. They neither spent any time in Anderson nor ever knew any Kennards. I never came close to considering that to be the case. It was a real revelation to me. I better address the question in the paper: "Why the Kennards?"

First, it is important to remember that all of our direct ancestors who do not bear our last names are equally kin to us as those bearing our last names. Shouldn't they receive equal attention from us as we give to our ancestors who bear our last name?

Secondly, the Kennards were original colonists of Grimes, County, Texas settling there in 1832, a fact worthy of at lest a degree of pride. Anderson, Texas is the County Seat of Grimes County. My paternal grandmother was a Kennard. She, all of her brothers and sisters, and the rest of her Kennard family lived in Anderson, Texas all of their lives. My immediate family was very close to my grandmother and spent a good deal of time with her in Anderson. In my mind, Anderson, Texas was a type of "Ground Zero" for my immediate family, despite the fact that we lived 10 miles away in the town of Navasota. My father was one of the first in the entire Kennard family to move away from Anderson. That was a "big deal" to the Kennards when he did so. They had always lived in Anderson. My grandmother actively opposed the move and sought assistance from other Kennard family members to prevent it. Of course, she was not successful.

Accordingly, I grew up knowing a lot of Kennard kinfolks. My sister lived in Anderson until she was 9 years old, so she knew a lot of Kennards and identifies with them too. After moving to Navasota, she and the rest of my immediate family spent a lot of time in Anderson. I personally spent a lot of time in Anderson while growing up, often spending weekends and summers with my paternal grandmother who was a Kennard. Accordingly, both my sister and I knew many Kennards and spent time with them. From the Kennards, we experienced genuine family love. Naturally, they were who we thought of first when family came to mind.

In fact, we identified with the Kennards a lot more than we identified with the Thomas' of Grimes County, even though the Thomas' had also been in Grimes County a very long time. One of the main reasons was that no Thomas family members lived in Anderson. They mainly lived in the northeast part of Grimes County around the community of Shiro (pronounced with a long "i"), Texas. Although we visited with a great aunt and uncle in Shiro occasionally, we simply did not form a close relationship with them or any other Thomas' other than our aunts and uncles, one of whom lived in Anderson. And his name was "Kennard" Thomas.

Further, our paternal grandfather, Gary Thomas, died when I was 5 years old and had dementia for a long time before that. Accordingly, I never had the opportunity to hear his stories about his family and childhood as I did with my Kennard grandmother.

At the risk of appearing pompous and aloof, we had more in common with the Kennards than the Thomas'. Whereas the Kennards were rather culturally sophisticated and well educated for their day, the Thomas' were less so. Nevertheless, the Grimes County Thomas' were known to be honest and hard working. I am no less proud of them than any other ancestors of mine. I just did not identify with them nearly as much as the Kennards.

It should be noted that my grandfather, Gary Thomas, had a rather amazing and inspiring story of how he came from a very poor farming background to become a college educated, highly regarded, and well respected banker and cattleman. That is beyond the purview of this paper, however.

Lastly, this paper is about the Kennards because that family enjoyed a high standing and good reputation in our home county. Everyone in my immediate family benefitted from that in many ways. I think that is also true for other Grimes County Kennards. It is logical, therefore, that the Kennard family is who we mainly identified with. I understood that my last name was Thomas, but my life experiences and my heart was with the Kennards. These are the reasons why this paper is about the Kennards.

What This Paper Is and Isn't.

I virtually performed no original ancestral family research for this paper relying totally upon the family research performed by others. I relied totally upon their research and conclusions. If they were wrong about something, this paper will also be wrong. The two main family research sources upon which I relied were prepared by Elizabeth Brown Richardson ("EBR") and Alta Kennard Patterson ("AKP"), both of whom did an amazing amount of research, and produced very thorough work products. They are from different generations. EBR is from my grandmother's generation while AKP is from my parents' generation. For the most part, their findings and conclusions are most similar. Both of their research reached back before the Norman Invasion of England in 1066. To indicate their commitment to thoroughness, it is most likely that EBR traveled to Europe to research the Kennard ancestry, but there is no doubt that AKP did so. There is no express indication that either used the work product of the other, but it is possible that they shared thoughts in some manner.

-- The EBR Resource --

1. Elizabeth Brown Richardson's work is referred to in this paper as "EBR." She was fondly known in the family as "Cousin Lizzie Lou." Her research is typewritten, most thoughtful, and very thorough. She began her work at least by 1914, and there is an indication that she (or someone) added information as late as 1964. It appears, however, that the vast majority of her work was complete sometime in the mid-1950s. It has a wealth of facts and considerable analysis of them. Apparently, she traveled more than once to the northeast, including New England, for research. Her work contains typed copies of various deeds, probate records, and the like dating back to the 1688. Her paper also contains valuable family lore that should be preserved.[1]

On the down side, however, the EBR documents came to me quite disorganized. They are copies of the originals with someone's handwriting in places. The pages are not numbered and not entirely in sequential order with some pages either missing or misplaced and I have not been able to locate them. Further, these papers cover different subjects in a disjointed manner, and were obviously not intended to be one integrated document that tells a coordinated story. Instead, they appear to be notes containing facts, thoughts, and recorded analysis. While we owe EBR an extreme amount of gratitude, these documents are confusing and only understood when carefully studied. For reference purposes, I numbered all pages by hand in pencil.

-- The AKP Resource --

2. AKP is a descendant of the Johnson County Kennards who moved there from Grimes County in the early 1850s. Her work product is in a hardbound book.[2] AKP's work is also most thorough and is most well done. While her work contains some valuable narrative information, it is quite limited. Her book is primarily in genealogical format. Because I am not used to that format, I find it a bit confusing to follow. While that format is a good way to show and record ancestral linage facts, it does not focus upon analysis of those facts or the preservation of family lore. AKP's book, however, contains some of that, but on a limited basis.

The only way to relate family lore is by a narrative account. I think it is most important to preserve family lore because if not recorded, it is in grave danger of being forever lost. We should, however, recognize that family lore may not be totally reliable. It is likely that family lore changes at least a little each time it is told. When stories are re-told it is always a little different than the version originally heard by the storyteller, especially from one generation to another. There is also the natural desire to embellish these stories slightly because of the common tendency to make the story more exciting or the feats more important than they really were. Most people want their ancestors remembered in a favorable light. Of course there is also poor memories that can taint family lore. When family lore is recorded in writing, these trends halt.

Putting the information of EBR and AKP in narrative form required me to exclude a good bit of their information in an effort to make the story easier to understand. This includes, but is not limited to, their resource materials such as direct quotes from original documents they relied upon like deeds, wills, and the like. The serious student of Kennard history should consult their original materials.

-- Additional Resources --

3. I also used materials about the more recent members of our family from Sharon Hurst Hibbert that were compiled by her father, Jack Hurst, Jr. She went to considerable trouble and expense helping me and was a valuable "sounding board" for me. Sharon's brother, Tommy Hurst, provided his father's written account of the time when he was missing in action behind enemy lines during World War II. Sharon, Tommy and I all share the same Kennard great grandparents. Tommy and I were also good friends in our youth.

4. Lastly, I relied upon verbal and written family information from Michael Moore of Irving, Texas. He is descended from Everett Kennard of the Johnson County Kennards and was most helpful. Michael is most interested in Kennard family history and heritage, and has performed a lot of original research into Kennard family history in his own right. We regularly trade information with each other. He is the one who kindly lent me AKP's book. His contribution was also invaluable.

To summarize, the main purposes of this paper is not to add to information that is already recorded, but to organize the recorded information in a narrative form so that it can be more easily understood, and to preserve family lore. I did, however, update information of later generations not currently recorded.

On the other hand, I performed research of a general historical nature to place family actions in context with the big picture of what was happening at the time in Texas, the U.S., or the world. I hope this is helpful. Parts of my family do not live in Texas. Accordingly, some readers of this paper will not be familiar with Texas history or Texas geography. This paper is written with them in mind.

Lastly, we must recognize the temptation to "build-up" our ancestors in our minds into something that they may not have been. They were human beings with weaknesses like everybody else. We do not know whether they were kind hearted, tough, quick-tempered, fun loving, serious, religious, smart, or not so smart. The further back in time they lived, the less we know about them. If we knew our ancestors, we do not even know if we would like them, or they like us. I doubt that I resisted that temptation in this paper, but I tried to keep it in mind.

5. General Business

The names of family members who are in the direct line of ancestors of this author appear in bold letters. Further, I chose to use endnotes instead of footnotes to avoid the temptation to read every footnote along with the paper. I find this confusing and hope using endnotes avoids this problem. Lastly, if an endnote contains the word "Id," it refers to the citation in the immediately preceding endnote. "Id." is commonly used as a citation in legal documents referring to a previous citation. Since my lifetime occupation was an attorney, I choose to use what I am familiar with. Lastly, please excuse the amateur textual formatting and photos in this paper. It comes from my lack of expertise in these areas.

The Kennards Before Coming to America

The consensus of opinion is that the names "Kennaird," "Kenward," and "Kennard" have their origin in Northern France, which was a part of ancient Gaul.[3] Northern France was also inhabited by people of the Celtic race who had invaded the area in the 10th century. Armies of this mixed race invaded England in 1066 under William The Conqueror.[4] The family name, therefore, came to England during the Norman Conquest as "Kenewardus" or "Keneward," as mentioned in the "Doomsday Book" in 1086.[5] Some of them found their way to Scotland.

There are a number of "Kenewsards," "Kennards", "Kenewarduses" and "Kinnairds" in English and Scottish history, but apparently, no direct connection was located providing links between any of them to members of our Kennard family.[6] According to AKP, family lore is that our family's ancestor living near Aberdeen, Scotland supported the "Pretender" in an attempt to free Scotland from England. When this attempt was defeated, our ancestor lost all of his land and property and he fled first to Northern Scotland, and later to the Ulster part of Ireland.[7]

THE VARIOUS SPELLINGS OF "KENNARD"

Initially, it must be recognized that compared to today's standards, spelling in general was rather imprecise as late as the latter part of the 1800s and early 1900s. Illiteracy or poor education (by 2018 standards) resulted in a lack of uniformity in spelling. While there were earlier English dictionaries that were not considered as being thorough, the first comprehensive Dictionary of the English Language was not published until 1752.[8] Often, phonetic spelling of words was a big cause of imprecise spelling. Phonetic spelling was made worse by various dialects. The spelling of surnames was perhaps even more imprecise than spelling in general. Surnames could be informally changed from one generation to the next, and sometimes from one locale to another. This was particularly the case for immigrants whose names were recorded upon entry to America by clerks.

AKP states that our original Scottish ancestor spelled his last name "Kinnaird." According to family lore, upon coming to America, he and his family simplified it by changing the spelling to "Kennard." However, an old Scotch schoolmaster scolded them for not using the original spelling, "Kinnaird." As a result, one of the brothers changed it back to the original spelling. Another brother compromised by changing it to "Kinnard." The last brother did not change and retained the new "Kennard" spelling. The respective descendants of each brother kept those spellings of their surnames.[9]

Kennards In America

I. Who Were Our First Ancestors in America?

Both AKP and EBR agree that the earliest proven ancestors of the Grimes County Kennards is Richard Kennard and his wife, Mary Pullen Howell, who married in 1693 and lived in Kent County, Maryland. That represents hard work by the two researchers and traces the family lineage back a long way. But there are still unanswered questions: from what locale or country did Richard Kennard come; who were his parents; how did he or his ancestors get to America and; from what locale or country did his parents come? From the two primary sources I used for this paper, the answers are at best unclear and at worst unknown.

AKP does not address these questions in her book. She mentions no ancestor in America before Richard Kennard. The likely reason is the lack of sound proof of a previous ancestor.

EBR, on the other hand, documents substantial research in search of answers to these questions. She presents a theory unsupported by direct documentary evidence, but is based upon circumstantial evidence and logical deductions from known facts. Still this theory is somewhat vulnerable to being disproved upon discovery of new facts. Simply stated, EBR's theory may be wrong. From the resources I have conveniently available to me, I cannot tell one way or the other.

EBR performed research in New England searching for a direct ancestor to Richard Kennard of Kent County, Maryland. She found an Edward Kennard who came to Portsmouth, New Hampshire from Kent County, England, and married Elizabeth Martyn there in 1680 or 82.[10] One of their children was a Richard Kennard who was born around 1673. Is this the same Richard Kennard as our direct ancestor who lived in Kent County, Maryland? Using somewhat tentative language, EBR states, ". . . [I]t seems to me our family begins in America with Edward Kennard who married Elizabeth Martyn in 1680. . . . " (Emphasis supplied)[11]

Somewhat contrary to this conclusion, however, is the existence of one Phillip Kennard who also lived in Kent County, Maryland at the same time with our undisputed ancestor, Richard Kennard. Phillip Kennard was a merchant in Kent County, Maryland, and there are many references to him in the official records in that area.[12] Richard Kennard and Phillip enjoyed a close relationship with each other.[13] As soon as Richard Kennard married he sold a portion of a parcel of land known as "Denbigh" to Phillip Kennard.[14] (The parcel of real property known as "Denbigh" or "Danby" will later be a key to tracing our ancestral heritage.) Phillip also was a witness to the will of the father of Mary's first husband.[15] In short, there is a lot of interaction between Phillip Kennard and our known ancestors living in Kent County, Maryland at that time.

EBR "thinks" Richard and Phillip Kennard might have been brothers. While acknowledging that she was unable to "establish" Phillip's kinship with Richard Kennard, our ancestor, she nevertheless concludes that they were "probably" brothers.[16]AKP says that this is just speculation, and as yet is unproved.[17]

EBR lists the children of Edward Kennard as Michael, John, Elizabeth, Sarah, Richard, Mary, and Abigale. [18] If our Richard Kennard was a brother of Phillip Kennard, why is Phillip not listed by EBR as a child of Edward and Elizabeth Kennard of Portsmouth, New Hampshire? This tends to indicate that they were not brothers, or that Edward and Elizabeth Kennard are not direct ancestors of the Grimes County Kennards. It is equally possible that Phillip is either a brother of Edward (and hence an uncle of Richard),[19] or that Phillip was Richard's cousin. Even though the precise relationship is un-established, they both lived in Kent County, Maryland at the same time, had the same surname, land was transferred between the two families, and there were other interactions between our proven ancestors and Phillip Kennard. Notwithstanding, it appears inescapable that from the resources I used, we do not know for sure who was our first direct Kennard ancestor in America, or where they came from.

One day, hopefully, the question of the identity of our precise ancestor who first came to America can be resolved. Once that is done, perhaps his or her ancestors can be determined thereby yielding more knowledge of our family heritage.

II. The Undisputed Direct Ancestors

Both AKP and EBR clearly conclude that Richard Kennard and Mary Pullen Kennard of Kent County Maryland are the earliest documented ancestors to the Grimes County, Texas Kennards. We can have great confidence that this is accurate. AKP's analyses and conclusions concur with the following summary by EBR of the early Kennards in America:

> Beginning with the marriage of Richard Kennard and the young widow Mary Pullen Howell in 1693, and the 700-acre plantation called "Danby," in Kent County Maryland, which she inherited from her father 'Capt.' Richard Pullen, I have an unbroken line down to 1956. This has been proved step by step by means of wills, deeds, court records and other legal documents. The following is therefore, authentic.
>
> Richard Kennard and wife Mary Pullen had two sons Richard Jr., and Nathaniel I, born between 1694 – 1700. We descend from Nathaniel I whose will was dated April 13, 1742. Under the title of Nathaniel Kenward, planter, Kent Co. His wife was Jane and his sons were Nathaniel II, and John. We descend from Nathaniel II, whose will was probated 1794. He mentions 'My dear wife' but does not call her name. His children were: Michael (from whom we descend) Nathaniel III, Joshua, Ebenezer, James, George, a daughter who married Copper, one who married Cowarden, Catharine who had married Blackiston, 'Hannah,' who married Beck.[20] (Emphasis Supplied) (Apparently, "Kenward" is how Nathaniel I spelled his name.)

It should be noted that there are many "Nathaniel" Kennards throughout the generations of Kennards. This Nathaniel is the first one directly related to us. Nothing suggests that any of them actually used in their names the designations "Sr., "Jr.," "I," "II," or "III," etc. Both EBR and AKP used the roman numerals to distinguish them from one another. I will do the same throughout this paper.

A. Richard Kennard and wife, Mary Pullen Kennard

While we do not know for sure who were the parents of our ancestor, Richard Kennard, we know a little about the father of his wife, Mary Pullen, from whom we descend. It must be recognized that even though his last name was not Kennard, he is just as much our ancestor as the unknown father of Richard Kennard. Mary Pullen Kennard's father was Richard Pullen.[21] His wife (and Mary's mother) was named Anne. His will is dated June 23, 1688,[22] and he left a tract of land called "Pullen's Refuge" to his daughter Mary, the future wife of Richard Kennard.[23] She also came to own a tract of land called "Denbigh" (i.e., "Danby") from her father that she later sold a part of to Phillip Kennard.[24] Mary died in 1736 [25] in Annapolis Maryland, and she bequeathed both tracts of land to certain of her children, one of which (Denbigh) to her sons, Richard and Nathaniel.[26]

Before marrying Richard in 1693,[27]Mary Pullen was first married to Nathaniel Howell who died. Mary then married Richard Kennard, and they had two sons: Richard and Nathaniel I.

Richard Kennard was born between 1640 and 1650.[28] His date of death is unknown, but inasmuch as his wife married twice more after his death, Richard was likely a young man when he died.[29]

B. Nathaniel Kennard I and Wife, Jane ?

Nathaniel Kennard I, son of Richard and Mary Kennard was born between 1694 and 1700. He lived in Kent County, Maryland where he died in or around 1742.[30] His co-ownership with his brother, Richard, of the parcel of the Kent County land known as "Danby" (i.e., Denbigh) is confirmed in a land Patent filed in the Maryland Land Office.[31]

In his will, Nathaniel I bequeaths property to "Jane my well beloved wife." (Emphasis supplied) He does not further identify her. He also bequeaths to his son, Nathaniel II, 75 acres of "Danby" (i.e., Denbigh).[32] The land known as "Danby" or "Denbigh" was transferred from one family member to another beginning in the latter part of the1680s through four generations of family members to the mid-1740s. These land transfers confirm the direct line of ancestry from Richard Pullen, father-in-law of Richard Kennard, the earliest undisputed direct Kennard ancestor, to Nathaniel Kennard II.

Nathaniel I and his wife, Jane, had nine children: Richard; Steven, Thomas; Michael I.; Mathew; Howard; Nathaniel II (direct ancestor of the Grimes County, Texas Kennards); Daniel; and Ann (born March 16, 1697).[33] Unfortunately, we really do not know much more about our ancestors, Nathaniel I and his wife Jane Kennard.

C. Nathaniel Kennard II

Nathaniel II, was born on November 17, 1718. He resided in Kent County, Maryland, where he died in 1794. His will is probated May 3, 1794.[34] His will mentions "my dear wife," but does not state her name.[35] Accordingly, her name is unknown. They had eight children: Joshua, Nathaniel III, Ebenezer, James, George, Catherine, Hanna, and Michael, the direct ancestor of Grimes, County, Texas Kennards.[36]

1. American Revolutionary War Service

AKP references a Kent County, Maryland militia and oaths of allegiance naming "Nathaniel Kennard" serving as a Soldier in the Quaker Neck, 2nd Co., 13th Batt, under Co. Richard Graves.[37] She further mentions other records as showing Nathaniel III's Revolutionary War service.[38]

EBR, on the other hand, documents a good deal of research in whether our ancestors served in the Revolutionary War.[39] She found a number of references to men named "Nathaniel Kennard," but could not establish that any of them were positively any of our ancestors. She seems to conclude that it is more likely that it would be Nathaniel Kennard III, who is not our direct ancestor, who served in the Revolutionary War than his father, Nathaniel Kennard II.[40] This is because he was 56 years old when the war started while Nathaniel III was 26 years old. It is possible that Nathaniel II served in the war, but not as likely as Nathaniel III.

Did any of the Grimes County Kennards participate in the American Revolutionary War? There is no documentation at my disposal establishing that they did so. It must be recognized, however, that there were likely many soldiers in that war whose documentation of their service either never existed, or has not survived the length of time from the war. If it exists today, perhaps it simply has not been found. This question is yet to be resolved for certain.

D. Michael and Johanna Kennard

Michael Kennard, the son of Nathaniel Kennard II, was born near Havre de Grace, Harford County, Maryland in 1744.[41] Harford County, Maryland is located on the other side of Chesapeake Bay from Kent County, Maryland where Nathaniel Kennard II grew up. It is presumed that he and his family made the move across Chesapeake Bay. One wonders why make the move? Was it because family land owned by family members of prior generations had been diluted because of numerous inheritances? We will likely never know the answer.

In 1765, Michael Kennard married Johanna ("Hanna") Drew, born on September 25, 1747.[42] They left Maryland about 1790 for North Carolina when he was 46 years old.[43] They were the first in their family to do so.[44] The 1790 Census of Wilmington District, Brunswick County, North Carolina lists as residents Michael Kennard, four sons over 16 years of age, three other sons, three females, and five slaves as living there.[45] Apparently, a brother of Michael Kennard, Nathaniel "Kinard" (likely Nathaniel III), also moved to the same area of North Carolina and is also listed as a resident in the same 1790 Census.[46]

After moving to North Carolina, they continued to move southwest. By 1792 or '93, they reached the center of the territory that was soon to become Tennessee[47]which officially became a state of the United States on June 1, 1796.[48] They lived near Murfreesboro (near Nashville). That area soon became a part of Rutherford County, Tennessee.[49] The Rutherford County records are full of Kennard family transactions.[50]

Why did they decide to move away from Maryland where their family had lived for at least 4 generations? Why did Michael and Nathaniel III stay in North Carolina for such a short period of time? Why did they move again to what would shortly become the State of Tennessee? Unfortunately, we do not know the answers to those questions.

About this time, however, the nation was experiencing a western and southwestern expansion. It began before the Revolutionary War and gained steam thereafter. This expansion was fueled by the Louisiana Purchase and other events.[51]

Quite a number of people at that time were moving to yet unsettled or new areas. If one makes his living from the land, the prospect of cheap (or even free) land that was unfarmed, and thus possessing all its natural nutrients making it fertile and productive, would be most enticing. EBR suggests that the Kennards left in search of virgin land.[52] A sense of adventure must have also contributed to this trend. The Kennards were participating in somewhat of a land rush in the new states to the south and west of Maryland.[53] In short, moving southwest was the "popular" thing to do at that time. It held the promise of financial reward, adventure, and excitement. These were likely at least contributing factors of Michael and Johanna Kennard's leaving Maryland.

Michael and Johanna Kennard had ten children, including Anthony Drew Kennard, this author's great great great grandfather.[54] The children were: (a) Ann, born August 4, 1766; (b) George, born September 23, 1768; (c) Mary, born February 1, 1770; (d) Michael II, born September 28, 1771; (e) James, March 8, 1773; (f) Catherine, born July 25, 1784; (g) Anthony Drew, born July 9, 1788; (h) John Kennard, born 1775; (i) Elizabeth, born 1777; and (j) Nathaniel, born 1779. Anthony Drew was their youngest son. He was around four or five years old when his parents got to Murfreesboro, Tennessee.[55]

Johanna Drew Kennard died January 10, 1804 when Anthony Drew was 16 years old, and his father, Michael Kennard, died January 1, 1810, six months before Anthony Drew was 22 years old.[56]

E. Anthony Drew and Sarah Moore Kennard

My great, great, great grandfather, Anthony Drew Kennard, was born July 9, 1788 in Harford County, Maryland.[57] His family moved to North Carolina around 1790 when he was about 2 years old.[58] In short order, the family moved to an area that soon became Tennessee. On October 16, 1808 near Murfreesboro Tennessee, [59] he married Sarah Moore born September 16, 1790.[60] Sarah Moore Kennard was born in Garrard County, Kentucky (south of Lexington and north of the Tennessee border) to Lodwick Moore and Rachael Cates.[61] It is unknown how or where they met each other. Her home county is about 200 miles from his home in Tennessee.

Anthony Drew and Sarah Moore Kennard had eight children: Michael Moore Kennard born July 27, 1809 (my great great grandfather), Louisiana Kennard born May 23, 1811, Rachael Kennard born August 8, 1813, William Everett Kennard born July 16, 1815, Anthony Drew Kennard (not our direct ancestor) born October 23, 1818, Marquis De Lafayette Kennard (Mark) born July 24, 1821, John Robert Kennard born July 25, 1826, and Sarah Louise Kennard born February 25, 1829.[62]

Around 1818, Anthony Drew and his brother, Michael Kennard II moved their families from Tennessee to the Alabama Territory,[63] which did not become a state of the United States until a year later, 1819.[64] They lived near Greensboro, Alabama.[65] The Alabama Territorial papers contain a petition, signed by Michael Kennard II and ten others, requesting the Alabama Territorial Governor to appoint Anthony Drew as Colonel of Shelby County.[66] He did not, however, receive the appointment. Further, the Alabama Territorial papers reveal that Michael Kennard II, the brother of Anthony Drew, was appointed Justice of the Peace of Marengo County, Alabama in 1818. He resigned in 1820.[67]

Parenthetically, Marengo County, Alabama is where the Thomas ancestors of this author lived around the same time period before coming to Texas. That area was not heavily populated. One wonders whether they knew, or knew of, each other.

1. The Move To Texas.

In the late 1790s, Moses Austin emigrated from Connecticut to Missouri when it was still a province of the Spanish government.[68] He was a young businessman who was likely always looking for business opportunities. After experiencing financial reversals caused by banks collapsing, including the Bank of St. Louis, and a crash in land values around 1818, Moses Austin dreamed of bringing colonists into Spanish Territory, also called "New Spain," in what is now Texas.[69] He contacted Spanish officials in what presently is San Antonio, Texas (then known as Bexar, pronounced as "Bear.") and, after experiencing rejection initially, he and a friend, Baron de Bastrop, persuaded the Spanish authorities to grant him permission to bring "Norte Americano" (i.e. North American) families to Spanish Texas.[70] Two of the successful arguments used were that (1) for several centuries the Spanish and Mexicans had not come in sufficient numbers to the area to settle it, and (2) the Indian danger in Texas was the main reason that discouraged such colonization.[71] Americans had a history of successfully battling native Indians and would provide somewhat of a buffer for future Spanish colonization.

Moses Austin became ill and died before seeing his idea of colonization come into fruition.[72] His son, Stephen F. Austin, had been working with his father on this matter and was recognized by the authorities as the heir of Moses. Thus, the Spanish authorities granted Stephen F. Austin permission to colonize what would later become Texas. He became the first and by far the most important organizer or "Empresario" of North American colonists into Texas.[73] He turned out to be quite skillful, well suited, and most successful in this endeavor. Stephen F. Austin is known as the "Father of Texas." He was beloved by the vast majority of the Anglos in Texas, and was their de facto leader. The city of Austin, Texas, the Capital of Texas, is named for him. If it wasn't for Stephen F. Austin, Texas may have never been Anglicized and become a part of the United States.

On August 24, 1821, Mexico won its independence from Spain.[74] However, this did not affect Stephen F. Austin's plans to colonize Texas. In 1822, the first North American colonists entered into the territory that was then known as Tejas (pronounced Tayhas with a long "a").[75] This first colony of Austin's is known as "The Old Three Hundred,"[76] a name well known to all students who took a Texas history course.

Although Stephen F. Austin was the initial and, by far the most significant and influential Empresario, there were others. One of the other Empresarios was Sterling Clack Robertson. Empresarios had enormous power over their colonies. For example, they could appoint various officials of the colony.[77]

While in Alabama, Anthony Drew and Sarah Kennard decided to move yet again. This time to Tejas; i.e., Texas. No doubt the prospect of obtaining large amounts of free land in Tejas lured them into making yet another move. The decision, however, was a great gamble for them. They were moving to another country that was completely unsettled and dangerous. What a monumental decision that was for multiple generations of their descendants.

At that time, Tejas was a part of the State of Coahuila, in the country of Mexico. In 1825, Empresario Sterling Robertson obtained permission to bring a colony to Tejas.[78] Anthony Drew and Sarah signed their family up and became members of the Robertson Company to move to Tejas.[79] Adult males were to receive large grants of land.

The Kennards and other future Tejanos arrived on the banks of the Sabine River (the boundary between Louisiana and Tejas of Mexico) in 1830. Unfortunately, in that year the Mexican government passed a law, known as the Decree of April 6, 1830, 11th Article. The decree virtually prohibited further immigration of Anglos into Texas.[80] This is because many in the Mexican government did not want the dominant culture in Tejas to be that of Western Europe with identity and loyalty more toward America than Mexico. This anti-American attitude was as much ethnic as nationalistic.[81] It was centered in the educated Mexican elite.[82] This law sewed the seeds of discontent and resentment among the existing Anglo colonists who viewed it as prejudice against them and their heritage. As it turned out, this attitude prevailed amongst the colonists for a long time.

Because of this law, the families of the Robertson Company, including Anthony Drew and Sarah Kennard, were denied entry into Tejas and the land that they had been promised. They had to wait at the Louisiana and Mexico border for the matter to be cleared up. They must have been extremely disappointed and frustrated at this turn of events.[83] But thankfully they were stubborn and determined, and found the patience to "wait it out" on the banks of the Sabine River in hopes of acquiring a lot of land in a place of promise.

In the meantime, Stephen F. Austin and another Empresario found a technicality to get around the law for 2 years.[84]In 1831, Stephen F. Austin, took over the Robertson Colony and secured the right to settle it in Texas. This became known as Stephen F. Austin's second Colony, and the Kennard family was a part of it.[85]

Anthony Drew made Application No. 29 with the Mexican government for his land. EBR says this is recorded in the Texas State Land Office in Austin, Texas.[86] The Application lists his age as 45 years and Sarah's at 42 years. It states that they came from Arkansas.[87] EBR suggests that they may have stopped there to grow a corn crop. Whether or not that is accurate is unknown. Anthony Drew and his family temporarily stopping in Arkansas, however, is consistent with family lore that this author heard as a youngster. Could it be that they spent their 2 years in Arkansas waiting to enter Texas?

Whether or not the Kennards were in Arkansas, they actually entered Tejas through San Augustine, Texas on the Sabine River. EBR says that, unlike most other Americans, the Kennards defied the Mexican law and actually crossed the river boundary to wait on the Tejas side of the border at St. Augustine for permission to proceed further into Tejas.

In any event, on November 22, 1832, Anthony Drew was ultimately granted his promised League of land, around 4,400 acres. This is a large amount of land, especially for East Texas where it was located. According to family lore, the Kennard family first arrived at their land near Gibbons Creek, Jones Field, on Christmas Eve in 1832.[88] This is about 7 miles Northeast of present day Anderson and was long known as "Kennards' Prairie."[89] That precise location was later sold to two brothers, William I. and John P. Roan. The name for this area changed to what it is called today, Roans Prairie.[90] Presently, the unincorporated community of Roans Prairie, Texas is located on Texas State Highway 90 between present day Madisonville and Anderson, Texas, at the intersection with Texas State Highway 30 between present day Huntsville and Bryan-College Station, Texas.

The name "Kennards Prairie" being changed to "Roans Prairie" is consistent with what a distant cousin, Edward Kennard, told me about 20 years prior to drafting this paper. Further, that the Kennards once owned the land where Roans Prairie is located is consistent with a provision in Anthony Drew Kennard's will bequeathing to his children funds due from "Roan."[91]

According to family lore, as related by EBR, upon arrival they briefly explored their new land and saw a flock of wild turkeys. Sarah exclaimed, "We shall have turkey for Christmas dinner tomorrow." After making camp, the sons went turkey hunting, but they returned unsuccessful. For the Christmas feast, they cooked their last old rooster.[92] The Kennards shortly dug a well on their property and built a log house.[93] Presumably, it was at the location where their more permanent house was located that I believe is closer to present day Anderson than Roans Prairie. Later, Anthony Drew and his older sons acquired more land in that vicinity as well as other parts of Texas.[94]

The Municipality of Washington was formed by the Mexican Government around 1835, a year before the Texas War of Independence. It had a large territory that was later divided into nine Texas counties after independence from Mexico, including Grimes County where Anthony and Sarah Kennard lived on their property.[95] According to EBR, Blair's Early History of Grimes County states that in 1835, the same year that the Municipality of Washington was formed by Mexico, Anthony Drew Kennard received 80 votes in an unsuccessful bid for the office of Sheriff of the Municipality of Washington.[96]

2. The Indian Problem For Settlers In Tejas (Texas)

Native Indians have been in Texas, for thousands of years. When the Spanish government entered Tejas, it created a vast trading network that attracted more Indians to move to what is now Texas in the early 1700s.[97] One of those many tribes was the Tawakonis.[98] The opportunity for horse and gun trade motivated more Indians to migrate to Tejas in the late 1790s.[99] This brought the Apache and Comanche, two of the most savage and fierce Indian tribes.[100] Indian attacks and raids upon what few Spanish colonists came to Tejas were primary reasons Spain was unsuccessful in colonizing Texas.[101] Please recall that one of the arguments to the Spanish, and later Mexican, authorities to allow colonists from America into Tejas was to solve the Indian problems and thereby remove the Indians as an impediment to future colonization of Spaniards, and later Mexicans, in Texas.

The need to colonize Tejas did not change once Mexico gained its independence from Spain in 1821.[102] The colonists were needed to serve as a buffer for the Mexicans against marauding Indians.[103] The Kennards soon became involved in that effort.

a. The Kennards and Indian Campaigns.

One should understand the nature of the dangerous challenges presented by the Indians to the new immigrants to Tejas. Most Indians were fierce fighters and were a clear and present danger to the colonists. That was simply the way of life for most Indians, particularly toward people who the Indians saw as invaders of their territory. Accordingly, all Texicans had to be good with knives and guns. "Survival demanded it."[104] The Indians were a very real threat to the Anglo-Americans living in Tejas.

Anthony Drew Kennard and 2 of his sons became involved in a campaign against Indians. On July 4, 1835, Captain Robert M. Coleman crossed the Brazos River at Washington, the future birthplace of the Republic of Texas (and about 35 miles from the Kennard home), with a company of 25 men. Their destination was Tehuacana Village of the Tawakoni tribe of Indians.[105] This is in present day Limestone County, west-northwest of current Mexia, Texas and south of present day Corsicana, Texas. Anthony Drew and two of his sons were in that company of men.[106] One of the two sons was William Everett Kennard.[107] The identity of the other "older" son is undocumented. They served in Colonel John H. Moore's Regiment.[108]

There are conflicting reports of the purpose of this campaign. One report strongly indicates that the purpose was to fight the Indians.[109] Another report is that the purpose was to negotiate a treaty with the Tawakonis.[110] Regardless which is correct, the Indians were told that Captain Coleman and his men were armed. This caused the Indians to prepare for a serious battle and a desperate fight ensued.[111] It ended with a number of Indians being killed but Captain Coleman lost only one man.[112] The deceased was not a Kennard. The Anglos withdrew to Fort Parker (near present day Groesbeck, Texas) without dislodging the Indians.[113]

Captain Coleman obtained reinforcements, but the Indians had fled upon his return. Coleman and his men, including the Kennards, attempted to find them by searching several weeks to the Northeast to present day Dallas, Texas, and then westward to the Brazos River in West Texas. The Anglos never found them, however.[114] Nevertheless, the Indians learned that the Anglos were willing to fight and were a force to be reckoned with.[115]

It is most likely that the Kennard family participated in other Indian campaigns, but this is the only one actually documented. The Kennards further involvement in Indian raids is discussed later in this paper.

3. The Texas War Of Independence From Mexico

The reasons behind the war for Texas' independence are complex. They include, but are not limited to: (1) the clash of cultures (Anglo vs. Spanish-Latin American); (2) the change in the Mexican form of government from one of Federalism where the states had the main power in government to Centralism where the central government has the main power; (3) the free spirit of the Anglos; (4) the dominance in Texas of Protestantism over Catholicism; and (5) certain new Immigrant-Anglos merely seeking adventure.[116]

A primary symptom of the general clash of cultures was an investigation by the Mexican government into Texas led by the elite in Mexico and the subsequent passing of the April 6th law that prohibited further immigration into Tejas from America, which was discussed above.[117]

One of the primary motivations for that law was ethnic in nature. The elite in Mexico did not want a culture dominating Tejas that was Western European instead of Latin American. This was a very consequential event with the existing Tejanos who came from America. It caused significant animosity among the Anglo colonists against Mexico sparking lasting anti-Mexican sentiment. The colonists "saw it as a gratuitous insult to their kind."[118] Indeed, the law is said to have been the stimulus for the Texas War of Independence from Mexico.[119]

When the Americans initially came to Tejas in the early 1820s, all of Mexico was under a constitution adopted in 1824 that provided for strong state governments; i.e., a "States Rights" structure where the central government was not dominate.[120] That was abruptly reversed in 1834 by the new President Santa Anna. He had the Mexican government void the Constitution of 1824 and adopt a constitution that stripped the power from the states and placed it with the central government ruled by Santa Anna.[121] That was unpopular among a significant number of Mexicans in Mexico. However, it was extremely unpopular with the Anglos and most of the Hispanics living in Tejas.[122] This was not a mere theoretical difference of opinion. The new constitution was close to being despised most Texicans. In fact, Tejas slowly became the refuge for Mexicans with anti-government sentiments providing both Anglos and Mexicans in Texas with a united cause.[123] This explains one of the early Texas Flags in the Texas Revolution that with a white background simply stated, "1824," a reference to the States Rights Mexican Constitution of 1824 that had been repealed.

The Texas colonists were independent by nature. They did not want any help or involvement from any government. Until Santa Anna's new constitution of 1834, Texans experienced self-government, which actually meant no government at all. The Mexican government simply was not a part of their lives. That changed with the central Mexican government directly "intervening" in the affairs of Tejas. In 1835, the central government sent Customs officers to Anahuac and Velasco, Texas. This resulted in violence. The Mexican central government responded by sending military to quell future uproars.[124] The Texans were hostile to a centralized authoritarian form of government.[125] This gave birth to an informal War Party in Texas that advocated independence from Mexico.

Initially, the War Party organizers and supporters were recent newcomers eager to stir up trouble just for the sake of adventure. Basically, they were "hotheads," or "revolutionaries" such as William Travis, James Bowie, "Three Legged Willie," and even Sam Houston.[126] They were not significant landowners who were established and provided structure to the community. Instead, they were simply adventure seekers and troublemakers.

There were also those who opposed war and a revolution against Mexico. They were a very loosely organized group that amounted to a Peace Party and were loosely led by Stephen F. Austin. At this point in time, he strongly opposed any type of insurrection. Length of residence in Tejas was a major determiner of who opposed violence against Mexico.[127] This makes sense because the longer the residence, the more likely substantial assets were acquired that would be totally at risk in an armed revolution. If everything is going pretty well, why rock the boat?

The War Party, however, gained steam as the heavy handedness of the central Mexican government continued to progress into the internal affairs of Texas, including military excursions into Texas to enforce its will on Texans. This was offensive to the free spirit - independent nature of the Anglos in Texas.

After a number of skirmishes with Mexican soldiers, a Convention to discuss independence from Mexico was held at Washington On The Brazos and attended by delegates of all populated areas of Texas. The Declaration was completed and signed by all delegates on March 2, 1836.[128] This was during the siege of the Texans at the Alamo. Before signing the Declaration, a delegate Henry Smith stated to the other delegates:

> Fellow-Citizens of Texas: The enemy are upon us. A strong force surrounds the walls of the Alamo, and threaten that garrison with the sword...Now is the day, and now is the hour, when Texas expects every man to do his duty. Let us show ourselves worthy to be free and we shall be free.[129]

At that point in time, Henry Smith's statement reflected the general sentiment among Texans.

a. What Was the Position of the Anthony Drew Kennard Family?

We have no indication that Anthony Drew and his sons were "hotheads" looking to make trouble for the sake of adventure. They appeared to live peaceably in Tennessee and Alabama. They were part of the Indian campaign against the Tawakonis, but that does not equate to them being adventurers. That could be considered as simply trying to make their new home safe for their family members. By the time of the Texas Revolution they had been in Texas for only 4 years, but they were owners of significant amounts of land that was producing a good living for the Kennards. They were probably considered to be among the "established" in the community making them less likely to want to "rock the boat" with a less certain future caused by a revolution.

In the end, we do not know where they stood on how Texans should react to the Mexican centralist government actions in Texas. Even if one assumes the Kennards had no opinions or even opposed war, like practically all Texans, they soon supported Texas Independence. This was even the case for the leader of the Peace Party, Stephen F. Austin. He traveled to Mexico for a diplomatic reason. Tensions had become high in Texas. While in Mexico seeking peace, he was imprisoned for over a year without a trial, and held incommunicado without visitors, books to read, or writing materials.[130] During this harsh and undeserved imprisonment, Stephen F. Austin's views on war changed 180 degrees. Now the popular de facto leader of the Texans became very much in favor of revolution and Texas' Independence from Mexico.[131] Further, the general "War Party" movement had gained momentum and the sentiment of the populace in Texas was clearly moving toward a war of independence from Mexico.

We do not know the precise attitude of the Grimes County Kennards toward war as it was brewing in its earlier stages. EBR's materials quotes from an early history of Grimes County, "The Kennard men took little interest in the political affairs of the colony, but participated in the military activities of the period."[132] Santa Anna's annihilation of the Texans at the Alamo on March 6, 1836 convinced all doubters in Texas of the of the need for war. No Anglo men survived the Alamo.[133] The men who lasted through the final successful Mexican attack surrendered, but were summarily executed, and their bodies piled up and burned.[134] Only one Anglo woman, several Mexican women, and a black slave were spared and allowed to leave, likely so they would teach the other Anglos about the consequences of taking up arms against Mexico.

To the Texas Anglos, race seemed to be dictating Santa Anna's actions toward them. After the defeat at the Alamo, fear of "ethnic cleansing" by Santa Anna caused an extreme reaction among Texans known as the "Runaway Scrape."[135] This was where Anglo-Texans quickly abandoned their homes, land, and much of their personal belongings to flee from the oncoming Mexican Army who they feared would treat the Anglos the same as those at the Alamo. The fear was so great that there are accounts of families fleeing so quickly that plates of food for meals were left uneaten on kitchen tables.

Anthony Drew Kennard and his family learned of the defeat at the Alamo from a signer of Texas' Declaration of Independence and a future President of the Republic of Texas, Dr. Anson Jones. He learned the news while in Washington-On-The-Brazos, which is located only about 35 miles from the Kennard home. The future President spent the night in the Kennard home and told them the bad news about the Alamo.[136] Jones later was the last person to serve as President of the Republic of Texas.[137] We do not know how the Grimes County Kennards reacted to the news about the Alamo, or whether they participated in the Runaway Scrape. There is no family lore that they did so which strongly indicates they did not flee like most of the colonists.

On the other hand, we know that Anthony Drew Kennard and some of his oldest sons joined the Texas Army during the war.[138] The sons in the Texas Army were William Everett, Michael Moore, Anthony Drew, Jr., and Marquis de Lafayette.[139] Initially, Anthony Drew did what was a perfectly acceptable practice at that time by substituting his son and my great great grandfather, Michael Moore, for Anthony Drew's service in the Army of Texas. Michael Moore was in the Company of Captain J. G. W. Pierson.[140] He served for his father from March 1, 1836 until June 1, 1836. Michael Moore served in his own name from June 20, 1836 until May 26, 1837. Eventually, Anthony Drew in person joined J. G. W. Pierson's cavalry of the Texas Army.[141]

Based upon the general sentiment of the leaders in Texas as well as the general populace toward independence, the fear of ethnic cleansing by Santa Anna and his army, and the actual participation by the Kennards in the Texas army, it is entirely reasonable to conclude that the Kennards of Grimes County fully supported a war for Texas to win independence from Mexico. Nothing indicates when their support for the war was adopted by the Kennards, but it appears to have been in full existence by the time the war started. That support put at risk not only their lives, but also all of the assets acquired in Texas, including their large land holdings.

The final battle of the Texas War of Independence was the Battle of San Jacinto where on April 21, 1836, the Texans won a resounding victory against Santa Anna and the Mexican Army. [142] Santa Anna, the commanding general and the President of Mexico was captured. This victory and his capture resulted in Texas gaining total independence from Mexico.[143] The War of Texas Independence lasted only several months. The second son of Anthony Drew, William Everett, is reported to have been in the battle of San Jacinto, and his name is on the San Jacinto Monument located near Houston, Texas.[144]

According to family lore reported to me while in elementary school in the 1950s, my direct ancestors were not in any major battles during the war including the Battle of San Jacinto. At that young age, I only had the impression that they were "doing something else in the army at the time." According to EBR, she had an interview in 1914 with a Mr. Zuber, who knew Anthony Drew, Michael Moore, and William Everett. EBR also read an article Mr. Zuber wrote in Texas Historical Quarterly. From this she states: "Michael was on baggage duty – and was ill the day of the [San Jacinto] battle, so said Mr. Zoober (sic)."[145]

In any event after independence was gained from Mexico, a government had to be formed for the new nation. The brand new Republic of Texas was born: an independent nation in and of itself. Slowly, a formal government was organized in 1837. Its name was The Republic of Texas, but it had no money whatsoever.[146] The lack of funds meant there was no money with which to pay it's soldiers for their military service; however, the Republic had an abundance of land. The Texas soldiers, therefore, received their payment by grants of land. This includes the Grimes County Kennards who served in the Texas Army. They were paid in land, which added to the acreage that they already owned.[147] In fact, the Grimes County Kennards, including

Anthony Drew and Michael Moore Kennard, acquired a lot of land, the benefits of which were realized by their descendants for at least 4-5 generations. This includes this author today in 2018, and his children.

4. Texas Becomes a State of the United States of America

Texas was an independent nation for over 9 years, from 1836 until the end of 1845. Mexico never fully accepted Texas' independence. In fact, Mexico made a few military excursions into the Republic of Texas during those 9 years. William Everett Kennard who participated in the San Jacinto campaign was involved in two of them. This will be discussed later in this paper.

The matter of annexing Texas was debated in the U. S. Congress for quite a while. Even that debate caused tensions between The U. S and Mexico. After resolving many political issues, a formal Treaty of Annexation was approved by the United States on December 29, 1845.[148] On that day, the Republic of Texas became a state of the United States of America, The State of Texas.

The aftermath of annexation was the Mexican – American War. Around 4 months after annexation, the Mexican- American War began in April 1846.[149] It was the first war in which the United States fought on foreign soil. I am neither aware of documentation nor family lore that any Grimes County Kennards participated in that war. It lasted until 1848. Mexico lost the war. It lost to the U.S. almost one fourth of its existing territory, including all of present day California, Utah, Nevada, Arizona, and New Mexico.[150] The westward expansion of the U.S. was given a significant boost.

5. Two Sons of Anthony Drew and Sarah Moore Kennard Move To Johnson County From Grimes County After Texas' Annexation.

Anthony Drew Kennard Sr. and his older sons who served in the Texas army in the War of Independence from Mexico were paid for their service in land. Further, at least one of his sons received payment of land from the State of Texas for service in battles against Indians. According to some sources, some of that land was in Johnson County, south of present day Fort Worth, Texas.[151] The major city in that county today is Cleburne, which is 32 miles from Fort Worth.

Two sons of Anthony Drew Kennard, Sr. moved from Grimes County to Johnson County. They were Anthony Drew Kennard, Jr. and William Everett Kennard. According to one source, around 1849, brothers William Everett and Anthony Drew, Jr. began to drive a herd of horses from Grimes County to Johnson County each Spring to graze on 12,000 acres. They would return to Grimes County each fall.[152] According to this source, the horses were acquired in trades in exchange for other land awarded them by Texas. The savage Comanche Indians dominated the land the brothers traded away.

After the death of their father, the two brothers and their families moved to Johnson County. Two other brothers from Grimes County, D.P. and A.D. Hadley, and their respective families joined them. Their father, Joshua Hadley, was a close friend of Anthony Drew Kennard. They made a second trip to bring 1,800 head of cattle and 300 head of hogs from Grimes County to Johnson County.

From these two brothers who moved to Johnson County, Texas, another line of Kennards were created leaving a commendable heritage in that county. Hence, the Kennard family influenced both Grimes County and Johnson County.

a. William Everett Kennard.

William Everett moved from Grimes County to Johnson County in the 1850s and settled in the Watts Chapel area. He was born July 16, 1816, and was a part of the San Jacinto campaign in the Texas Revolution.[153] In 1840, the Kickapoo and Cherokee Indians murdered J. M. Tidwell and took his wife and 2 children captive near present day Calvert, Texas.[154] William Everett participated in the effort to rescue them.[155] In 1841, he was elected a Captain in the Militia.[156] Six years after independence (1842), he participated in the fighting that opposed the invasion into Texas of the Mexican Army commanded by Mexican Gen. Adrian Woll in 1842. General Woll, on behalf of Mexico, had captured and taken control of San Antonio. After 8 days, Gen. Woll abandoned San Antonio by retreating and crossing back into Mexico.[157]

The following is a quote from a writing of Abraham Zuber who was also in the San Jacinto campaign.

> Captain William Everett Kennard was a noble man worthy to be remembered and a truer friend I have never had. He and I were school mates, and frequently mess mates in the (Texas)

> army, and from an intimate acquaintance with him from boyhood to old age, I knew him to be an honest and faithful friend.[158]

Furthermore, his death on February 14, 1899 was covered by the Galveston News on February 15, 1899 dateline Cleburne, Tex. stating in part:

> Captain Wm. Kennard, one of the old landmarks of this county (Johnson County), died at his home . . . [At San Jacinto] he saw victory perch upon the banners of the Texans and saw 'mid smoke of battle and the thunder of cannon a new republic born. For twenty years, he, with other pioneers, fought back the savage tribes of Indians and helped to push civilization into the frontier of Texas.[159]

William Everett was married twice, once to a Sarah Ann Mildred Robinson. That marriage ended in divorce. Later, he married Sarah Williams De Number. There were 4 children born to his first marriage, John, Rachel Virginia, Dorothy Ann "Dollie" Kennard, and William Everett, Jr.[160] Dorothy Ann (Dollie) Kennard married William Hudson Moore.[161] They are direct ancestors of Michael Moore of Irving, Texas who is a student of Kennard family history and collaborates with me about the Kennard family. To the second marriage of William Everett Kennard, there was apparently one child born, John DeNumber.[162]

b. Anthony Drew, Jr.

The other son of Anthony Drew Kennard Sr. who moved to Johnson County was his namesake, Anthony Drew Kennard, Jr. After Independence but before moving, he participated in several skirmishes against Indians, after which he began farming and raising livestock in Grimes County. He married Sarah Smith in 1841. In 1853, Anthony Drew, Jr. moved to a farm in Johnson County left to him by his father-in-law.[163] It was located about ½ mile from Grandview, Texas that is 37 miles south of Fort Worth and only 19 miles south of Alvarado, Texas on Interstate 35W as of this writing. There is a report that in 1864, he bought land in Johnson County for $2.50 per acre.[164] Furthermore, in 1853, he received from the Texas Government a grant of land in Johnson County.[165]

A few years later, Anthony Drew Jr. moved to other land he owned 9 miles from Cleburne. There, he engaged extensively in the stock raising business. In 1854, he was elected County Commissioner of Johnson County, but in 1859, he moved to Jack County, Texas located 82 miles west northwest of Cleburne where he planned to raise stock and mine salt.[166] However, Comanche Indians who were savage and accomplished fighters on horseback inhabited this area. No other tribe in America was their equal in this regard.[167] Jack County was in Comanche "territory" at that time. The Comanche perceived all settlers as a real threat: "white aggressors" trying to steal Comanche controlled land. Their torture of white captives was severely brutal, cruel, and well known among settlers.[168] Because of dangers to his family presented by these Indians, Anthony Drew, Jr. moved back to Johnson County. He then acquired more land in Johnson County and was a major landowner, farmer, and stock raiser in the county.

Anthony Drew, Jr. was a pioneer of Johnson County and helped organize the county and its government. He also helped establish the Masonic Lodge in Grandview. He donated a cowbell to the Lodge. He found the cowbell on a cattle drive to Kansas. This bell was used to call the meetings of the Masons to order. He helped organize The First National Bank of Cleburne in June 1883 where he served on the Board of Directors. Likewise, he helped to establish a railroad line between Cleburne and Dallas.[169]

He and his wife had six children. One was David Kennard who served in the Confederate army. David was captured and died while in a Union prison in Douglas, Illinois (or Camp Douglas near Chicago).[170] Another child of theirs was (Mark) Kennard who moved with his parents to Johnson County in 1853 when he was a very young boy. Marcus Kennard was also a pioneer of Johnson County, and gained a position of prominence as a man with agricultural and business interests. Beginning with 200 acres given to him by his father, he eventually amassed an 8,000-acre ranch in Johnson County. It is said that he ,"had a magnificent country residence and also interests in Jack and Wise Counties."[171] Indeed, Marcus Kennard was a successful and prominent agricultural businessman in Johnson County.

6. Insight Into Sarah Moore Kennard, Wife of Anthony Drew Kennard Sr.

Sarah Moore Kennard, the wife of Anthony Drew Kennard and mother of Michael Moore Kennard and others, was a native of Kentucky, born September 16, 1790. She married on October 16, 1808 in Tennessee and eventually ended up in present day Grimes County, Texas with her husband and family in 1832. She was an original colonist.

In 1890, one of her friends in Texas provided the following insight into the type of person she was. This unnamed friend stated:

> "About 1812, she joined the Baptist Church, and lived and died a devoted Christian. . . When she came to Texas it was a province of Mexico, and all this country was known as Austin's Colony. She lived through many eventful changes and stirring events; many trials and hardships attendant upon pioneer life; and admidst (sic, amidst) all, conducted herself as a lady, a devoted wife and mother, a pious Christian holding fast to the faith once delivered to the Saints."[172]

It is indeed rare to get a close insight like this into what a person was really like who lived so long ago. It is made even more special since that person is a direct ancestor, indeed, my great great great grandmother. She was a person deserving of our admiration. Note that she joined the Baptist Church during the War of 1812. I find it fascinating to find out now, in 2018, that my great great great grandmother joined the Church the year of the War of 1812 started.

7. Family Lore Of Events In Grimes County After The Texas War of Independence.

I think that it is important to preserve verbal accounts of events that happened before our time. Otherwise, it may well be lost forever.

a. Problems With Indians

When I was a young boy during the 1950s, my paternal grandmother, Stella Kennard Thomas told me bits of family lore. There were two stories she told me several times, and versions of both them are also recounted by EBR in her paper.[173]

(1). In 1840 a family named Hadley lived relatively close to Anthony Drew and Sarah Kennards' house in Grimes County. Indians raided the area. Some of the people were barricaded in the Hadley home and others were barricaded in the Kennard house. A woman, a Mrs. Taylor, was in the Hadley house while for some reason her husband was at the Kennard house. The Indians were repulsed from attacks at the Hadley house. Thereafter, against the admonishments of the others seeking refuge in the Hadley house, Mrs. Taylor left the safety of the house with her children to join her husband at the Kennard home. Unfortunately, the decision to leave the Hadley house was most ill advised. The Indians overcame Mrs. Taylor and her children. She was killed and the children taken captive while in sight of the Hadley house. It must have been horrifying for the people in the Hadley house who watched it and likely could hear their screams

It was customary for Indians to take children to be slaves and occasionally to eventually adopt them as family members.[174] They did not kidnap babies. Instead, babies were killed.[175] Here, the Indians were vigorously pursued by the Anglos who, fortunately, rescued the children and took them to the home of Henry Fanthorpe and his wife, Rachael. (Rachael happened to be the daughter of Anthony Drew and Sarah Kennard.)[176] Most likely, some, if not all, of the Kennard men took part in the recovery of the children.

(2). On another occasion, when, for some unknown reason, all of the men were away from the Kennard home, an old slave woman discovered Indians killing the Kennards' calves nearby. She quickly told the lady of the house, Sarah Moore Kennard. When Sarah made no effort to protect their property from the Indians, the old woman became vexed and cried out, "Missi what shall we do? What shall we do," to which Mrs. Kennard replied, "We can do nothing but trust in the Lord." The old woman then responded in ethnic slang language something like, "Dat am a mighty pore help when de Injuns am out dar killin de calves."[177]

These stories told to me by my grandmother and related by EBR in her paper are almost identical to each other. In addition, Sarah Moore and Anthony Drew Kennard were the great grandparents of both my grandmother and EBR. This makes them just 2 generations away from these actual events. It is, therefore, highly likely that these events as recounted above are reasonably accurate.

b. Three Notch Road

I vaguely remember my paternal grandmother telling me when I was in the 5th or 6th grade about how "Three Notch Road," now state highway FM 2562, came into existence. Much later when I was around 55 years old, I contacted a distant cousin who was of my parents' generation and had retired to Anderson, Texas. His name was Edward Kennard. He was raised in Anderson, but went to work for General Motors Corporation where he excelled in his career. Upon graduating from The University of Texas, he taught school in a one-room building, but shortly joined the military for World War II. After the war, Edward Kennard started out as an assistant parts warehouse manager at GM. He advanced through the ranks at GM to director of Marketing, and ended his career as vice president of General Motors and General Manager of the Cadillac Motor Division. In any event, Edward Kennard showed my wife and me the location of the Anthony Drew and Sarah Kennard home place located on FM 2562 known as "Three Notch Road." In doing so, he told us was how "Three Notch Road" came into being.

This story is also related by EBR in her paper, but in greater detail than I was told by my grandmother and distant cousin.[178] EBR interviewed one J.L. Dreher, who was at the time an elderly former resident of Grimes County. He told her the story of Three Notch Road. Mr. Dreher was presumably two generations older than her making him a contemporary of Anthony Drew Kennard or his children. The following was derived from EBR's paper as well as family lore told by my grandmother and Edward Kennard. There is a lot of evidence to support this account being accurate.

Anthony Drew Kennard sent one of his sons (a boy at the time) from their Grimes County residence to pick up supplies at a trading post in present day Madison County by way of Old Springfield Road. Madison County is immediately north of Grimes County. The trading post was about 15-20 miles from the Kennard home place "as the crow flies," but considerably farther using routes known at the time. The son rode a mare horse that had a foal which was left at the Kennard home. Anyone with horse experience knows that all horses are always anxious to return home from wherever they are. This is even more the case for a mare with a young colt at home. She is lead by motherly instincts and the desire for the colt to nurse.

Once done with his business at the trading post, the boy felt like there must be shorter way home than the route he took there. Having confidence that the instincts of the mare would guide her back home the shortest way, the boy "gave the horse her head," meaning that he did not try to guide the horse home, but rather let the horse find her own way back using her instincts. According to EBR's account, they encountered a hard rain drenching the young man and his clothes. A group of friendly Indians of the Bedias Tribe took him in, dried his clothes, and gave him food. The boy soon resumed his trip and continued to travel home with his horse taking him through what is now Bedias and Singleton, Texas where the boy discovered a water spring from which he drank.

He then proceeded home through what is today Roans Prairie and on to the Kennard home. Anthony Drew was surprised the boy returned so soon and was excited to learn of the newly discovered water spring. The next morning, Anthony Drew got on his horse and followed his son's horse tracks left in the rain drenched mud to re-trace the shorter and quicker route to the trading post and to the newly discovered spring. With a hand axe, he cut three notches in trees along the way to mark a route for future use. Hence, the name "Three Notch Road."

Not only the Kennards used this new trail to the trading post, but so did others including Indians. Before long, the trail was used by horse, mule, and ox-drawn wagons and it became a road that extended past what is today Bedias, Texas proceeding north toward Singleton and Madisonville, Texas. It was the primary route between Anderson and Madisonville. Later the new route was used by motor vehicles and eventually became paved roads maintained by various governmental entities.

Today, part of the road is a highway with two lanes that is maintained by the State of Texas, FM 2562. The highway runs past the original site of the Anthony Drew and Sarah Kennard home place. They are both buried on that property next to the current fence line that borders the right-of-way for that highway that some of the locals still call "Three Notch Road." It is used by passenger and commercial vehicles alike for all purposes. It all started one day with a young boy's decision in the 1830s to let his horse find its own way home.

Anthony Drew Kennard died in 1848 and Sarah Moore Kennard died in 1877. In 1936, as a part of the Texas Centennial (100th anniversary), the State of Texas erected a monument at the gravesites of Anthony Drew and Sarah Kennard. As stated above, these graves are located beside the state highway, which runs by their home place. It recognizes that Anthony Drew was a former member of the Texas Army in the War of Independence. Unfortunately, the monument misstates that both of them were born in Tennessee. Instead, he was born in Maryland and she in Kentucky.

Likewise, in 1936, a monument was erected at the east lawn of the Grimes County Courthouse in Anderson, Texas acknowledging Grimes County residents who were in the Texas Army during that war. Anthony Drew Kennard is prominently listed on that monument. I have personally seen both sets of monuments and have pictures of them.

F. Michael Moore Kennard and Mary Ann Womack

My great great grandparents are Michael Moore and Mary Ann Womack Kennard. Michael Moore Kennard was the oldest son of Anthony Drew and Sarah Kennard. He was 23 years old when he came to Texas in 1833 with his parents and the rest of his family.[179] Because of his age, Michael Moore Kennard also acquired land grants from Mexico independent of his father. He received ½ of a League of land or 2,214.2 acres in what in the future would be Grimes County.

He was a part of the Texas Army in the War for Independence from Mexico and acquired additional land in payment for his services. He was a First Sargent in the JP Pierson Cavalry Division during the War for Texas Independence.[180] For this military service, Michael Moore received a land grant in Leon County, Texas, situated two counties north of Grimes County. He personally knew Jim Bowie, Davy Crocket, Sam Houston, and all of the early Texas patriots.[181] He was a member of The Texas Veterans Association and was known to actively attend its functions.[182] During his lifetime, he acquired a good deal more land. In short, he was a very big landowner even though he eventually sold some of it outside of Grimes County.

Michael Moore Kennard married Mary Ann Womack on November 26, 1838, which was two years after the Texas War of Independence.[183] Mary Ann Womack was the daughter of Abraham Winter Womack and Elizabeth Combs Robinson.[184] Although they did not have the last name, Kennard, they are just as much our ancestors as those with the name of Kennard. They are my great great great grandparents.

The 1850 Census shows Michael and Mary Ann Kennard had 4 children: Anthony Drew, Susan Elizabeth (Uzzel), Mary Lou, and Abraham Winter.[185] There was one child born to them after the 1850 Census, my great grandfather, John Henry Kennard, born June 23, 1852. He married Hattie Brown, born July 31,1856, my great grandmother.[186]

Michael Moore was a very large landowner, farmer, and stockman.[187] He also went into business with his father-in-law, Abraham Winter Womack, and Henry Fanthorpe, his brother-in-law who was married to his sister, Rachael Kennard Fanthorpe. Henry Fanthorpe was a rather recent immigrant who came directly from England. Their business was the first mercantile store in present day Anderson, Texas; however, Anderson was at that time called Alta Mira.[188] They freighted in $10,000 worth of merchandise over land to the store named "Fanthorpe, Womack, and Kennard."[189] That was a lot of money in those days.

1. The Fanthorpe Inn

Before opening the business with his two partners, Henry Fanthorpe built a comfortable 2-story log house for his new bride, Rachael Kennard, near where the mercantile business was to be located.[190] This was where two roads regularly used by travelers intersected each other and upon which two stage lines traveled three times a week.[191] Henry and Rachael soon built a larger structure for an inn or hotel for the stagecoach travelers.[192] It was (and still is) known as Fanthorpe Inn and became very well known and quite a popular hotel from the Republic of Texas days at least until the Civil War, and probably thereafter. Many high profile people of the day stayed there before the Civil War, for example:

1. Kenneth Lewis Anderson - Vice President of the Republic of Texas died while at the Inn. One account says that realizing he was dying, he went there for his last days. He is buried across the street from the Fanthorpe Inn in an old tiny cemetery sometimes called the Fanthorpe Cemetery. The town of Anderson was named after him.
2. Sam Houston - U.S. Congressman from Tennessee, Governor of Tennessee; Commander of the Texas Army during the war for independence; President of The Republic of Texas, Governor of and U.S. Senator from the State of Texas;
3. Zachary Taylor – U.S. Army General who led American troops in the Mexican – American war, and future President of the U.S.;
4. Robert E. Lee – U.S. Army officer, and future Confederate General of major import who commanded the entire army of Northern Virginia;
5. Stonewall Jackson – U.S. Army officer, accomplished future Confederate General with stunning successes, of major renown and beloved in the South, and who was respected in the North to a surprising degree;[193]

6. Jefferson Davis – U.S. Secretary of Defense and future President of the Confederate States of America;

7. Ulysses S. Grant – U.S. General, future Union General in the Civil War of considerable capabilities and credited for winning the war for the Union, and future President of the U.S.[194]

The annexation of Texas into the U.S. on December 29, 1845 sparked the Mexican – American War that began in April 1846. Most likely, the men listed above associated with the U.S. military were passing through Anderson, Texas in connection with that war.

While this author was a youngster in the 1950s and early 1960s, an individual, Edward Buffington, owned the Fanthorpe Inn and it served as his family residence. The Texas Parks and Wildlife Department purchased the property in 1977.

Back to my great great grandparents, Michael Moore and Mary Ann Womack.

2. Insight Into Mary Ann Womack Kennard.

EBR relates a story told to her by her grandmother Elizabeth Kennard Uzzell, a daughter of Michael and Mary Ann Womack Kennard. The story offers another interesting and valuable insight into the character of a direct ancestor. The story begins at the Fanthorpe Inn in Anderson. During a yellow fever epidemic, a stagecoach driver spent the night in a room where the stage drivers slept that was in the Fanthorpe Inn stable.[195] The stagecoach driver became ill. Rachael Kennard Fanthorpe, the sister-in-law of Mary Ann Womack Kennard, checked on the driver and took him food. She did not realize that the driver's illness was yellow fever. She continued to attend to him, but he died 2 or 3 days later. People at that time presumed yellow fever was highly contagious. Word spread in the community and surrounding area that the man died of yellow fever. Rachael also became ill with yellow fever. People were genuinely frightened of contracting the disease. Many even fled Anderson running from the yellow fever. A doctor even ordered Rachael to be quarantined.

Somewhat amazingly, my great great grandmother, Mary Ann Womack Kennard, bravely nursed her sister-in-law, Rachael, during her quarantine for 6 weeks. This was done in a little log cabin, despite the risk to her own health and her own life and in face of the fear in the community and surrounding area.[196] Upon returning home every day from caring for Rachael,

Mary Ann's clothes were either burned or boiled to avoid contracting and spreading the disease. Then, she would bathe in "strongly medicated water."[197]

She did not contract yellow fever. It was discovered much later, however, that there is no actual risk of catching yellow fever from humans because mosquitoes, not humans, spread the disease. This in no way, however, detracts from Mary Ann's heroism. At the time of these events, Mary Ann and everyone else believed that yellow fever was highly contagious and spread by human contact. In her eyes and those who knew about her actions, she was risking her own life to nurse her husband's sister.

A handwritten note on p. 82 of EBR's paper states, "Aunt Hattie said Mrs. Fanthorpe died with the disease. Must ask Cousin Julia (EBR)." Presumably, "Aunt Hattie" was my great grandmother, Hattie Brown Kennard, the wife of John H. Kennard. This implies that Rachael died of yellow fever in the above story. If that is correct, this incident occurred in 1867 which was the year both Rachael and Henry Fanthorpe died.[198] One account says they both died of yellow fever.

This story in its entirety shows the high degree of character and bravery of Mary Ann Womack Kennard. She understood that she was putting her life at risk to care for Rachael. Yet, she did it anyway. That makes her a hero and someone to be admired in my view. This story engenders a lot of pride in me about my great great grandmother. She had character. She had courage.

Michael Moore Kennard died 21 years after the death of his wife, Mary Ann.[199] He died on July 7, 1895. Using simple math, that means that Mary Ann Womack Kennard died sometime during the year 1874.

3. Insight Into Michael Moore Kennard

Michael Moore Kennard was the owner of much land and was a "farmer," a term that at the time most certainly included cattle ranching and raising cotton. Additionally, he was a businessman owning mercantile, hardware, furniture stores, and possibly other non-agricultural businesses.

The information immediately below is from an interview of EBR with my great grandmother, Hattie Brown Kennard (also known as Mrs. John H. Kennard) about her father-in-law, Michael Moore Kennard. The date of the interview is unknown, but it could not have happened after 1948 because that was the year she died.

When Michael and Mary Ann were first married, they lived near the Catholic Church, which could have been located at its current location at the top of a hill east of main street of Anderson on the road to Navasota. Later, they built a country home on their property.[200] Presumably, this is the two-story house that was refurbished (and is currently still enjoyed) by their great great grandchildren of the Hurst family. It is located east of Anderson, south of Richards, not far from the settlement of Apollonia. Years later, Michael Moore and Mary Ann built a furniture store in Anderson. The upstairs of the store was finished out as residential quarters where their family lived. This is where his wife and 2 young daughters died. All 3 of them were buried in Fanthorpe cemetery.[201] The store burned down in 1875 together with the entire east side of the downtown area of Anderson.[202] Coincidentally, that was the same year that my great grandparents, Hattie Brown and John H. Kennard, were married.

Anderson was incorporated for several years, and on August 20, 1875, Michael Moore Kennard was sworn in to office as an Alderman.[203] Both Michael Moore and his father were Masons, with Michael Moore obtaining the degree of Master Mason on December 18, 1847, and the Royal Arch degree was conferred upon him on December 31, 1847.[204]

He appears to have been like most grandfathers, kind, gentle, caring, and loving toward his grandchildren. EBR's mother was a granddaughter of Michael Moore and Mary Ann Kennard. Her name was Margret Uzzel Brown, married to Walter Scott Brown. She told EBR that she always looked forward to her grandfather, Michael Moore Kennard, coming to visit. He rode a large white horse and his saddlebags were stuffed with sticks of candy and other treats for the children.[205] He likely was a striking figure atop that white horse.

EBR relates family lore that provides significant insight into Michael Moore Kennard. It demonstrates his character and personal bravery involving something that he felt strongly about. EBR's grandparents, C.D. Uzzel and Elizabeth Kennard Uzzel, told her about how a Confederate soldier was killed in battle outside of Texas. His body was wrapped in charcoal and brought back to Texas.[206] Most likely, this was Mary Ann Womack's brother, Volney E. Womack, who was killed at the battle of Pleasant Hill, Louisiana on April 9, 1864.[207] He had been temporarily interred in Michael Moore and Mary Ann Kennard's front yard awaiting a proper burial.

After the Civil War was over and during Reconstruction, Union troops passed by Michael Moore and Mary Ann's country home. Suspecting that the family had buried meat there to hide from the Union troops, the Union soldiers threatened to dig up the grave. Michael Moore Kennard sat on his porch with 2 guns across his lap and told the Union troops that he would kill anyone who went close to the grave. After much heated argument, the soldiers could tell that he was serious and it was not an empty threat. The troops then left without incident.[208] Obviously, the idea of disturbing the grave of this family member - soldier caused strong emotions in both Michael and his wife, Mary Ann. He was willing to put his life at risk and kill others to prevent it from happening. This reveals his courageous character.

Had the soldiers gone to the dense woods in the nearby creek bottom of the plantation, they would have found large quantities of meat and other supplies that were being jealously guarded by former slaves of the family.[209] Apparently, Volney Womack's body eventually received a proper burial service. He is now buried in the Odd Fellows Cemetery in Anderson which is where most of my Kennard relatives are buried.[210]

10. Kennards In The Civil War.

The secession movement of states withdrawing from the United States began in 1860. The first state to secede was South Carolina on December 20, 1860.[211] For Texas, a special - called Convention convened on February 1, 1861 to address whether Texas should also secede. The delegates to the Convention almost unanimously decided to hold a special vote and let the citizens decide the issue. On February 23, 1861, Texans overwhelmingly voted secession of Texas from the Union over the strong objection of Sam Houston, (the former Texas Army General, first President of the Republic of Texas, and then second term Governor of Texas).[212] Texas quickly became a state of the Confederate States of America on March 22, 1861.[213] It was the seventh of the 11 Confederate states to secede from the union.[214] Hostilities starting the civil war began on April 12, 1861 in South Carolina.[215]

A number of Kennards were active in the Civil War by serving in the Confederate military. They were: (1) William Everett Kennard, son of the colonists Anthony Drew and Sarah Kennard;[216] (the same person who was an Indian fighter, in the Battle of San Jacinto in the War for Texas Independence, and thereafter fought to repel Mexican Army incursions into Texas); (2) John Robert Kennard, also the son of colonists Anthony Drew and Sarah Kennard;[217] (3) Anthony Drew Kennard, son of Michael Moore and Mary Ann Kennard (making the colonists Sarah and Anthony Drew his grandparents);[218]and Daniel Kennard, the son of Anthony Drew Kennard, Jr. from Johnson County. There were other Kennards either living in Grimes County or Johnson County who fought in the Civil War.

a. John R. Kennard. John R. Kennard, the youngest son of Anthony Drew and Sarah Kennard, was a field officer and Major in General Pat C. Davidson's Confederate Army. John R. Kennard was wounded in battle and was involved in "hard fighting."[219] In fact, he organized a company of infantry that called itself the "Grimes Boys" that was incorporated into the Tenth Texas Infantry of the Confederate Army. On October 21, 1861 while in Galveston, Texas, he was elected by his men to be their Captain on October 21,1861.[220]

He played an important role and distinguished himself in Tennessee at the Battle of Missionary Ridge near Chattanooga, Tennessee on November 27, 1863. Missionary Ridge is near Chattanooga, Tennessee. Parenthetically, my maternal great grandfather was the pastor of a Methodist Church in Chattanooga at that time. His name was Absolom Deacon Stewart. Among the Union troops, he was known as the Rebel Preacher because he prevented Union cavalrymen from stabling their horses in the Methodist Church building.

Back to Capt. John R. Kennard. The following quote is from an ancestral paper of Louis Poole on the Bookman family of Grimes County, Texas. In that paper, the author states that there is, "a biography of Major General John A. Formwalt, which is the most concise, but detailed history of the 10th Texas Infantry that I have been able to find."[221]

> In one of the first charges [by Union forces] against the Texans, their Brigade Commander, General Smith was severely wounded as was Colonel Mills of the 10th Texas Infantry Regiment. Colonel Granbury took command of the Brigade and Captain John R. Kennard was placed in charge of the 6th, 10th, and 15th *Consolidated Texas Infantry.[222] (Emphasis supplied.)

The remaining account of that battle describes how the Confederate Texans repelled several attacks, but during the following days were required to retreat from Missionary Ridge into Georgia, likely near Ringgold Gap in northwest Georgia. Nevertheless, Captain John R. Kennard successfully commanded many soldiers in that part of a major battle and performed well in doing so.

Demonstrating John R. Kennard's leadership and tactical skills while commanding in the field, the following is stated in Hess, Earl J., Civil War Infantry and Tactics, (Louisiana State University Press 2015):

> At the battle of Ringgold (Gap) the (Confederate) consolidated 6th, 10th, and 15th Texas occupied a position that placed the center exactly over the sharp crest of Taylor Ridge. The slope was so steep that neither flank could see the other. Capt. John R. Kennard therefore placed another captain in charge of the left wing while retaining control of the right. He also placed Assist. Adj. Gen. J. T. Hearne near the center of the line 'so that the orders could be better observed and passed.'[223] (Emphasis supplied.)

Indeed, despite being elected to his military rank by his men, Capt. John R. Kennard's rank during the civil war was anything but figurative or ceremonial in nature. He was an accomplished field officer who distinguished himself in many battles.

After the war, John R. Kennard practiced law in Anderson, Texas and later became a State District Judge. He was married to Sallie R. Noble from Houston and died on October 27, 1884.[224]

b. Anthony Drew Kennard (the grandson of the colonist.) Anthony Drew Kennard, a son of Michael Moore Kennard, was obviously named after his grandfather, the original colonist. This Anthony Drew Kennard served in the Army of Virginia during the Civil war.[225] In the book Rebel Yell, a biography of General Stonewall Jackson, it is stated that, "two of three deaths in the civil war were by disease rather than by minie balls (i.e., bullets)."[226] This Anthony Drew, was one of those statistics. He died of pneumonia on November 27,1861 in Richmond, Virginia.[227]

There is family lore I was told while very young concerning this event. It was related to me several times by both my paternal grandmother, who was born a Kennard, and my father at separate times. It is about one of my ancestors dying during the civil war in Virginia. The story is about how this ancestor's slave, who went to war with him, appeared at the parents' home of the deceased leading his horse that was riderless. From their front porch, the family saw from a far distance the horse being led down the lane to their farmhouse. At first, the distance prevented them from identifying the objects coming down the lane. As the slave and riderless horse got closer to the family home, the family was gradually able to make out what they were. They slowly and painfully deduced that their son had died, and the slave was leading the son's horse home. That was the sad and gut-wrenching way his family learned of his death.

I was too young at that time to have an appreciation of what part of the family the deceased ancestor belonged; and accordingly, I do not now remember it. After reading EBR's account above, I now believe it is most likely that the ancestor the story is about was a son of Michael Moore and Mary Ann, Anthony Drew Kennard. It was probably they who had to watch the sad story slowly unfold in front of their eyes. They were my great great grandparents, and the grandparents of my paternal grandmother, Stella Kennard Thomas. What a tragic way to learn of their son's death.

c. Unidentified Kennard. There was an event told to me by my father, Marion Brown Thomas. Practically all of my Kennard ancestors were Masons during this time.[228] One of my Confederate army Kennard ancestors was captured by the Yankees and placed in a firing line for immediate execution. The ancestor was a Mason. The Union officer in charge of the execution squad was also a Mason. Just before the Union Officer gave the order to the execution squad to fire upon the line of captured men, my ancestor made a secret Mason sign. Upon seeing the secret sign, the Union officer/Mason pulled my ancestor out of the execution line, thus saving his life. All of the remaining Confederate prisoners in the line were shot and killed.

d. Unidentified Kennard. Finally, there are also stories from my dad and paternal grandmother about how one of the Grimes County Kennards was captured and imprisoned in one of the Union prisons. There were horrible stories about how the Confederate prisoners were treated in that prison, including how this ancestor caught rats for food while in prison just to stay alive. I do not know whether these last two accounts are about two separate ancestors, or if they involve the same person, but both stories were told to me several times when I was a youngster.

5. The Death of Michael Moore Kennard

As my great great grandfather, Michael Moore Kennard, aged, he moved into the home of his son and daughter in law, John H. and Hattie B. Kennard, my great grandparents.[229] He lived with them 6-8 years. After that, his daughter Elizabeth (EBR's grandmother) and her family moved into Michael Moore's home in the country beyond the settlement of Apollonia (a few miles east of Anderson), and he lived with them until his death on July 7, 1895, only 20 days before his 85th birthday.[230] At the time of his death, he was believed to be the oldest resident of Grimes County.[231]

Elizabeth Brown Richardson (EBR) was the oldest great grandchild of Michael Moore Kennard and remembered the night of his death. Recall that he lived with EBR's grandparents. She was 3 years 10 months old at the time, but vividly remembered the sound of the frogs as they drove across a swampy creek bottom on the way to her grandmother's home. The loud sound of the frogs croaking made a lasting impression upon the young child.[232] This might not seem like much of a story to the reader, but it is meaningful to me. It is rare when one can read a personal account of the day of death of one's great great grandparent. It is further special because the deceased was an original colonist who was among the first to settle Texas.

Michael Moore Kennard is buried next to his wife, Mary Ann in Fanthorpe Cemetery across the road from the old Fanthorpe Inn in Anderson. His grave is only a few yards away from the grave of Kenneth L. Anderson, the last Vice President of the Republic of Texas and the person for whom the town of Anderson was named.[233] A tombstone with the Masonic emblem marks his grave.[234]

Michael Moore Kennard was an original colonist of Texas, a businessman, farmer, and stockman. Relative to the times in which he lived, he and his wife seem to have been financially successful. He acquired a large amount of land from which many of his descendants benefited, some as far away as 3 generations. The country home that he and his wife built was refurbished in the 1980s. Now, more than 123 years after his death, that house is still being enjoyed by some of their descendants; namely, the children of Jack Jr. Hurst who are great great grandchildren of Michael and Mary Ann Kennard.

Apart from financial success, Michael Moore and Mary Ann Womack sacrificed significantly for their country, state, and local community. Michael Moore served in the Texas War of Independence and likely in Indian campaigns. Both he and Mary Ann lost a son in the Civil War. Mary Ann also lost a brother in the Civil War. Mary Ann demonstrated a great deal of courage by heroically nursing Michael's sister with yellow fever. Michael served as a leader in the City of Anderson. Beside all of that, they both seem to have been caring, committed, and loyal people. I bet that Michael was a striking figure on that large white horse of his. I wish I could have known them, but they both died long before I was born.

G. John H. and Hattie Brown Kennard.

A legacy of Michael Moore and Mary Ann Kennard that is most personal to me is their youngest son and my great grandfather, John H. Kennard. He was born June 23, 1852 and died November 12, 1929.[235] He married my great grandmother, Hattie E. Brown Kennard. She lived from July 31, 1856 until March 4, 1948.[236] They were affectionately known by their grandchildren as "Papa Kennard" and "Mama Kennard."

1. Hattie E. Brown Kennard (Mama Kennard) and Her Family

Hattie Brown Kennard's father was Dr. George Washington Brown, another of my great great grandfathers. He was born in Mecklenburg Virginia in 1826 to James Pride Brown and Mary Burnett, my great great great grandparents.[237] Dr. George Brown attended Howard College and then the Pennsylvania Medical School, of national repute, where he received a medical degree in 1846. On May 30, 1849 Dr. George Brown married Louisa Jane Scott of Perry County, Alabama. She was a graduate of Alabama Female Institute in Dayton, Alabama. They lived in Marion, Alabama, also in Perry County, where he had his medical practice. Marion is near Selma, Demopolis, and not far from Tuscaloosa, Alabama. Dr. Brown and his wife had 5 children while living in Alabama: James T., Minnie, Cornelia, Hattie (Kennard), and Sallie.

Parenthetically, Marion Alabama is roughly 50 miles from Marengo County, Alabama where my paternal Thomas ancestors were before moving to Texas, and 100 miles from Shelby County, Alabama where the Kennards first lived in Alabama.

In 1852, Dr. Brown and two of his brothers bought 1,200 acres of land in Grimes County, Texas. He then returned to his medical practice in Marion, Alabama leaving his brothers to oversee and run the farming of the property. In 1860, he moved his family to the Texas property. Their travel was slow using trains and wagons. Dr. Brown volunteered for the Confederate military while in Texas. After their move to Texas, Dr. Brown and Louisa Jane Brown had five more children, George W. Jr. (who also became a doctor), Walter Scott, Alexander Lee, Dudley, and Mamie. From family lore and personal experiences, I know that Walter Scott and his descendants were close to my grandmother and her family. Also, from family stories, I know that Dudley Brown (known affectionately by my father and uncles as "Uncle Dud") was a long time partner in the cattle business with my grandfather Gary Thomas, that they worked closely together, and they were close friends.

Located in the same room with me as I write this paper in Plano, Texas is a large piece of furniture that I understand was special ordered by Dr. George and Louisa Jane Brown. It is a very tall 6 – 7-foot secretary with a "pull-down" providing a writing surface.

There are conflicting versions about how this fine piece of furniture was transported to Grimes County. According to one story, it came to Texas from Alabama when the Browns moved to Texas in 1860. The other story is that it was special ordered by the Browns after their move to Texas and transported to them by train. The piece of furniture can be disassembled. I had it done twice moving it to both of my homes in the Dallas, Texas area. It follows that it would have been possible to have been disassembled and fitted into a horse or ox drawn wagon, but there would not be much room for other things. Of course, it appears that Dr. and Mrs. Brown were relatively well off financially for that time, and it is therefore possible that they had several wagons to bring their belongings to Texas.

I occasionally rode in mule drawn wagons as a youth and in high school. I know that they are not very big and it would be difficult to keep nice furniture from being damaged in wagons. This is because of the very rough and bumpy ride produced by wagons across pastureland or even dirt roads. The rough ride of a modern vehicle across undeveloped natural pastureland or even graded dirt roads cannot be compared to the roughness of a wagon ride which could easily damage even a disassembled piece of furniture. Because of that, I believe it is more likely that the secretary came the entire way to Texas by train, but I by no means discount the possibility it came by wagon.

In any event, it was inherited by my great grandmother Hattie Brown Kennard from her parents, and was in her home in Anderson for a good number of years. Later, my grandmother, Stella Kennard Thomas, inherited the piece of furniture and it sat in her bedroom for well over 17 years. After her death, my mother acquired it and she kept it in her den in Navasota, Texas. When she moved to Dallas, Texas in her later years, the secretary was moved to my house, then in Richardson, Texas. I later moved it to Plano, Texas where it now sits in my home office storing much of my Texas library.

a. Brief Insight Into Hattie Brown Kennard.

The only person living with whom I have ready access that knew Mama Kennard is my sister, Mary Stewart Thomas Ramsey. She was 9 years old when Mama Kennard died at the age of 92. Accordingly, my sister never knew Mama Kennard in her prime; and as a matter of fact, she only knew Mama Kennard in her advanced years which is not an adequate picture of what she was like.

My sister also remembers visiting her often with our parents and having family meals at Mama Kennard's house. My sister recalls Mama Kennard being a good conversationalist. My sister also remembers that Mama Kennard wore eyeglasses, but in her later years, her eyesight improved rendering her eyeglasses unneeded and she quit wearing them.

My sister remembers Mama Kennard's 90th birthday party. People came from the entire locale as well as cousins from Houston to celebrate it. Her birthday was in July so it was hot. Since there was no air conditioning, the party was held in the yard of her home. My sister further remembers that on the day of the party, she and my mother went to Bryan to pick up a specially baked multi-tiered birthday cake. On the drive back from Bryan to Anderson my sister was on the back seat with the cake. She accidentally stepped in it! The cake was ruined, but my sister said nothing. She just stayed quiet. When they arrived back home, my sister ran into the house, immediately went to the bathroom, and locked the door. My mother was furious upon discovering the damaged cake. After much coaxing, my father eventually convinced my sister to come out of the bathroom. My sister says that the party still went on without a hitch. Someone else had also brought a cake.

2. Children of John H. and Hattie Brown Kennard

My great grandparents, John H. and Hattie Brown Kennard, were known to their grandchildren and great grandchildren as "Papa Kennard and Mama Kennard." They had 6 children: Hiram Robert Kennard born September 22, 1876; George Brown Kennard (named after his maternal grandfather, Dr. George Brown) born January 23, 1879;[238] Mary Lou Kennard born September 8, 1881; Stella Scott Kennard, my beloved grandmother, born April 11, 1883; Lizzie Kennard born July 28, 1885; and an unnamed infant daughter born December 29, 1896.[239] Note that my grandmother's middle name, Scott, is the maiden name of her maternal great grandmother, Louisa Jane Scott, the wife of Dr. George Brown, discussed above.

(1) Unnamed Infant. The unnamed infant daughter, who was a great aunt of mine, only lived about a month and a half and died February 13, 1897.[240] Her grave is located in the family plot in the Odd Fellows Cemetery west of Anderson, Texas.

(2) Hiram Kennard. Hiram was killed on December 20, 1894 at the age of 19 years while he and his younger brother, George Brown Kennard ("Uncle Brown") were walking home from a saloon in Anderson one night. I was told that they stopped and sat down to rest before they arrived home. Uncle Brown's revolver accidently discharged when it slipped out of his pocket and hit a rock resulting in the bullet striking Hiram and killing him.

While visiting the family gravesite with my father and grandmother during my elementary school days in the 1950s, I asked why Hiram died at such a young age. My father's response was for me to drop the subject and not talk about it. After taking my grandmother home, my dad told me the story of Hiram's death. He and I talked about it several times thereafter. Once he said nobody would know for sure what happened that night.

I had a very close relationship with my grandmother and spent a lot of time with her. One time during the latter part of my elementary school days, I violated my father's instruction from several years before and broached the subject with my grandmother. She was visibly uncomfortable discussing the incident, but answered my question while staring at the floor during the entire time of her answer. Her account was essentially the same as my dad's but was very brief and to the point. That should not be surprising. One of her brothers killed another brother. It was tragic. It was painstakingly sad for her entire family, and especially for the immediate family. That the accident happened five days before Christmas day added to the tragedy. I did not pursue this matter further with my grandmother. I now realize that I should not have brought up the subject with her. I should have complied with my dad's clear admonition to stay quiet.

(3) Mary Lou Kennard. Mary Lou ("Aunt Mary Lou"), was never married and lived one lot north of my grandparents' home in Anderson. She was likely named after her aunt, the sister of her father. I was told that Aunt Mary Lou and my grandmother had an extremely close relationship. They were only two years apart in age. Both Mary Lou and my grandmother attended Kidd-Key College at the same time together in Sherman, Texas. She was beloved by all of the Kennard family. My father and both of my uncles spoke of her quite fondly. Mary Lou died June 16, 1939.[241] According to my grandmother and father, the cause of death was cancer.

(4) Stella Scott Kennard. My beloved grandmother, Stella Scott Kennard, was born on April 11, 1882 and married my grandfather James Gary Thomas (Gary) on June 18, 1907.[242] He was born February 6, 1877. My grandparents lived in Anderson, Texas and had 3 sons, the oldest being John Kennard Thomas (to my sister, me, and my cousins, "Uncle Kennard") born October 2, 1908. He married Adele Pollard ("Auntie Adele") born September 13, 1903, a schoolteacher in Anderson schools. They were close to all in my immediate family. He died August 19, 1984 and she on September 14, 1990. Both are buried in my grand parents' family plot in Odd Fellows Cemetery a couple of miles west of Anderson, Texas.

The middle son was my father, Marion Brown Thomas born in Anderson, Texas May 24, 1913. He married my mother, Virginia Josephine Stewart, in 1936. Marion Brown Thomas died an untimely death at age 48 of a heart attack on February 7, 1963. Both are buried in the Navasota Cemetery in Navasota, Grimes County, Texas, 10 miles west of Anderson, Texas. Note my father's middle name was "Brown" after his maternal grandmother's maiden name, Hattie Brown, and his maternal great grandfather, Dr. George Brown.

The youngest son was JG Thomas, born November 28, 1924. He married Charlotte Crowley in 1954. He died December 8, 2016 and is buried in Odd Fellows Cemetery near Anderson, Texas. At this date, Aunt Charlotte still lives in Houston, Texas. Uncle JG's actual real and official name was simply the initials, JG, despite his father's name being James Gary.

My beloved grandmother Stella Kennard Thomas died February 19, 1965. Her husband, Gary Thomas died March 10, 1953.

Stella Scott Kennard Thomas at a young age sometime after her marriage to Gary Thomas

(5) George Brown Kennard. George Brown Kennard ("Uncle Brown"), a son of John H. and Hattie Brown Kennard, was the namesake of his maternal grandfather, Dr. George Brown. Uncle Brown was born in 1879 and died in 1954. I was 7 years old when he died so I have very few memories of him. I nevertheless recall that he was tall and had a rather reserved personality, but at the same time he was not at all bashful. He was President of the First National Bank of Anderson for a long time. His first wife was Lillian Campbell of Anderson who was born in 1879 and died in 1939 (long before my birth), leaving Uncle Brown a widower.[243]

They had one child, John Kennard. She is buried in George Brown Kennard's family plot in Odd Fellows Cemetery a short distance west of Anderson, Texas.

Uncle Brown was married again to Winnie Phillips Kennard originally from Gainesville, Texas. She was a widow of a descendant from one of the two sons of Anthony Drew Kennard, Sr. who moved to Johnson County, Texas after annexation of Texas, as discussed above. They met while Uncle Brown visited some of his Johnson County cousins. Think about it. Since Aunt Winnie was the widowed wife of her first husband whose last name was Kennard, she didn't even have to change her name upon marrying my great uncle Brown Kennard.

I knew Aunt Winnie fairly well. She could talk a "hundred miles a minute." Her voice carried quite loudly, which belied her rather short stature. She may not have been five feet tall. She was well liked and loved by her stepson, John, and her step grandchildren. The same was true for the rest of the Grimes County Kennards and others in Anderson. She was quite interested in Kennard family history, and was a student of it. I believe that the EBR materials came to me indirectly from Aunt Winnie. She was a nice lady. Aunt Winnie was born in 1888 and died in 1969. She is buried in the George Brown Kennard plot in Odd Fellows Cemetery west of Anderson, Texas.

(6). Lizzie Kennard. Lizzie Kennard ("Aunt Lizzie") married John (Jack) Thomas Hurst, (to me Uncle Jack). I have never learned of a middle name for my great aunt, Lizzie. Possibly, she did not have one. Her granddaughter, Sharon Hurst Hibbert, informed me that it is unknown whether her official first name is "Elizabeth." We know that she never used it, and that the family bible refers to her as "Lizzie." Her granddaughter says she always signed her name "Lizzie." When she signed her will, however, her lawyer required her to sign as "Elizabeth."

Like both of her older sisters, Aunt Lizzie went to Kidd-Key College in Sherman, Texas. She and Uncle Jack lived in Anderson, Texas all of their married lives. At one point, they lived for a considerable time in the house next door and immediately south of my grandmother and grandfather. Interestingly, immediately north of my grandparents was an empty lot, but one more lot to the north of that lived Mary Lou Kennard, the eldest sister of Lizzie Kennard and my grandmother. Accordingly, all three sisters practically lived in a row next door to each other in Anderson, Texas.

During my lifetime, Aunt Lizzie Kennard and Uncle Jack lived in the Anderson home that was formerly the residence of her parents, John H. and Hattie B. Kennard. It was a fine old two story house with a barn complete with chickens, a hog or two, livestock fences, a milk cow, a sizable vegetable garden, and an approximate 8-10 - acre lot behind the house. Aunt Lizzie and Uncle Jack had one child, a son, John Kennard Hurst, ("Jack Jr.").

Uncle Jack was a cattle rancher, cotton farmer, and he and Aunt Lizzie ran a hardware store that also sold groceries, saddles, saddle blankets, bridles, miscellaneous hardware items, and livestock feed. I think of Uncle Jack and Aunt Lizzie more as secondary grandparents than great uncle and aunt. I spent a lot of time in their home when I was between the age of 8 and 13 spending the night with their oldest grandson and my cousin, Thomas (Tommy) Hurst who lived in Austin, but visited his grandparents regularly. We were great friends.

2. Main Achievement of John H. Kennard. I never knew my great grandfather, John H. Kennard because he died November 12, 1929, 18 years before I was born. Papa Kennard was the primary founder of The First National Bank of Anderson. Opening day of the Anderson Bank was June 27, 1904.[244] Among original shareholders were John H. Kennard, Gary Thomas, Dudley Brown (the brother of Mama Kennard), and W. S. Brown (also the brother of Mama Kennard) along with several other community leaders. Construction for the permanent building that housed the bank started May 1905.[245]

Founding the Anderson Bank by Papa Kennard was of great significance to him as well as his immediate family and their descendants. (1) The Anderson Bank provided an occupation for Papa Kennard. While I do not know this as a fact, I have the very definite impression that Papa Kennard was the first President of the bank, but I definitely know that he held that office for quite a long time. (2) Gary Thomas, my grandfather and the husband of Papa Kennard's daughter, Stella Kennard Thomas, was an original shareholder and worked as a vice-president in the bank from its inception until his retirement. (3) Papa Kennard's son, Uncle George Brown Kennard, worked for the bank likely all of his adult life, and ultimately served as its President for many years.

The Bank later served as the workplace for many other family members for at least 4 generations after Papa Kennard, including (a) a longtime President of the Bank, John Kennard, the son of Uncle Brown Kennard, (b) my father Marion Brown Thomas, for a couple of short tenures, (b) his brother my Uncle Kennard Thomas for his entire career, (c) Aunt Lizzie's son, Jack Hurst, Jr., (d) Sarah Hereford Dietrich, the granddaughter of John Kennard and daughter of Johanna Kennard, and (d) even me during two of my high school summers. In addition, the first husband of Johanna Kennard, Richard Hereford, and the current President of the Bank has worked at there and has served as its President for over 30 years.

To pay for all of my expenses while attending law school, I made arrangements to borrow the necessary funds from the Anderson Bank. They gave me a sweetheart deal: I simply drew down on funds as I needed them with the promise to pay them back in quarterly payments in unspecified amounts that I could afford. I sold my inherited stock in the Anderson Bank while in law school and applied the proceeds to my note with the bank. It paid about half of the cost of law school. That kept me from graduating law school hopelessly in debt. All of this allowed me to have a profession that I greatly enjoyed, and for which I believe that I was well suited. I paid off all of my note to the bank within 4 years after I began practicing law.

I certainly count myself, my wife, and children as definite beneficiaries of the bank's founder, my great grandfather. Indeed, all of the descendants of John H. Kennard named above, and their families, owe him a great debt of gratitude for his part in the First National Bank of Anderson.

While Papa Kennard's descendants no longer hold controlling interest of its stock ownership, the First National Bank of Anderson is one of the more (if not the most) prominent banks in Grimes County. Some Kennard family descendants still own a significant percentage of the stock of that bank and to this day, serve as members of the Board of Directors; namely, Sharon Hurst Hibbert, a great granddaughter of John H. (Papa) Kennard. Her father, Jack Hurst, Jr. and her brother, Dr. Edward Hurst of Rockwall, Texas served as Board members prior to her.

Today, the First National Bank of Anderson is quite successful. It contributes greatly to Grimes County and continues to be a major institution in the county. It has been well run throughout the years by Kennard family members, and has been a major part of the lives of many Kennard family descendants. Indeed, the founding of that bank was likely the major achievement of John H. Kennard.

The John H. and Hattie Brown Kennard Family

Standing from left to right: Uncertain (believed to be Lillian Campbell Kennard, the 1st wife of Brown Kennard), Brown Kennard, John H. Kennard (Papa Kennard), Uncertain (believed to be Mary Lou Kennard), Hattie Brown Kennard (Mama Kennard), John Kennard (son of Brown Kennard), Gary Thomas (my grandfather), Lizzie Kennard Hurst, & Stella Kennard Thomas. Bottom Row: Marion Brown Thomas (my father), JG Thomas, Jack Hurst, Jr., Kennard Thomas, and Jack Hurst, Sr. Photo likely taken in the mid 1920s.

3. Special Insight Into My Grandmother, Stella Kennard Thomas

My grandmother was married to James Gary Thomas. Everyone called him Gary. To my sister and me he was "Big Dad." His is a most inspiring and interesting story because he brought himself up from an uneducated and culturally unsophisticated farm boy to a college educated banker and cattle rancher who was well regarded in Grimes County. That story, however, is outside the purview of this paper.

My grandmother presents unique and interesting characteristics to discuss. To my older sister, our grandmother was "Mama Thomas," most often shortened to "Mama." I found this too confusing because I also called my mother, "Mama." Borrowing what my cousin, Tommy Hurst, called his grandmother, I began calling my grandmother, "Grandmama."

I felt an extreme degree of closeness to Grandmama. She was special to me and most beloved by all of her sons, daughters-in-law, and grandchildren. She was truly a very loving person. There may never be anyone as unselfish as her, especially when it came to one of her sons, daughters-in-law, or grandchildren. There was not anything she would not do for them.

I spent the majority of weekend and summer weekday nights at her Anderson home during my youth. Her house was not air conditioned, other than one window unit used to cool her living room and dining room. The only time it was used was during family Sunday or holiday meals. She never used air conditioning without family there. Accordingly, she and I spent a lot of time during the hot summers on her front porch to stay cool (or less hot). At nighttime, we watched fireflies and visited. That is when she told me stories of her youth and about family members. It should be understood that having no air conditioning was the norm in the 1950s, not the exception.

Stella Kennard Thomas was a true lady of her time. In most ways, she was rather Victorian. She never went inside a grocery store or drove a car because they were not the ladylike thing to do. Further, she never mentioned the words "arm" or "leg." To her, they were "limbs" because ladies should not talk about "arms" or "legs." She was a strong Christian who read the Bible regularly. She absolutely never drank alcohol, and would not even allow it or a deck of playing cards in her house because of the evil they represented. At the same time, she never judged others who drank or played card games.

She and both of her sisters graduated from Kidd-Key College in Sherman Texas. My grandmother was a Latin scholar who occasionally read books in Latin. She was an accomplished mathematician and tutored local high school students in math, including me in algebra and plane geometry. She was also an accomplished pianist. She loved to play her piano which was of the highest quality, a Steinway. My grandmother played the piano for her church. She regularly played the piano for family members during gatherings, and often she just played for her own enjoyment. Her windows were kept open during the warmer days so that you could her hear her beautiful music outside. On one occasion while a couple of blocks from her house,

I remember hearing her beautiful piano music. A number of people other than me could hear it too. That made me feel proud that she was my grandmother.

At the same time, she did a few things that were non-Victorian in nature. So that I could ride horseback as a youngster around Anderson when I stayed with her, she caught and saddled my horse every day when I was too young to do so.

She was also very heavily involved in the cattle business partnership she shared with her sons. They raised cattle in two locations. The larger tract, 1,800 acres, was on land that she and her husband purchased and raised cattle upon. It was located about 5-6 miles southwest of Anderson. The other parcel of land was about 450 acres my grandmother owned that was inherited from her parents. It was northeast of Anderson relatively near the country home of her grandfather, Michael Moore Kennard. That parcel may well have been part of the land he received from Mexico for colonizing Texas.

My dad drove her to our ranch southwest of Anderson almost on a weekly basis (weather permitting) to inspect the cattle. They inspected the cattle on the other tract about once a month. Beginning around the 2nd grade, I usually accompanied them. Grandmama kept a ledger book that described every cow owned by the business and each calf they had. She felt that it was her job to know every head of cattle and their calving history. I currently have that ledger book in my possession.

When we rounded-up the cattle, some 300-400 head, she closely inspected them by fearlessly walking among the cattle in the holding pen of about 4 acres. It was tightly compacted with 300 – 400 head of semi-wild cattle. She was in her mid to late 70s years at the time and carried a walking stick to keep her footing stable. These were semi-wild animals that had been herded from the pastures to the cattle pens by cowboys on horseback and cow dogs. The cattle were nervous, unstable, and could easily attack. Thankfully, they never did. Her sons tried to persuade her not to do this because of it being unsafe, but she paid no attention to their efforts. To think that this was the same person who was a bit Victorian is a little hard to comprehend. Nevertheless, that was my grandmother.

To summarize, Grandmama was quite a lady and a very special person. She did not know what the word "favoritism" meant when it came to her family. She was sweet, caring, and considerate. To say that she was most meaningful in my life is frankly a gross understatement. I loved her very much. I still do.

H. The Next Generations of Descendants of John H. and Hattie Brown Kennard

All of the grandchildren of Papa and Mama Kennard were male: John Henry Kennard, the son of George Brown Kennard; John Kennard Thomas (Uncle Kennard), the son of Stella K. Thomas; my father, Marion Brown Thomas, the son of Stella K. Thomas; JG Thomas (Uncle JG), the son of Stella K. Thomas; and Jack Hurst, Jr. (Jack Jr.), the son of Lizzie Kennard. Each of these grandchildren were college graduates.

1. John Henry Kennard. John Henry Kennard, was the son of George Brown Kennard. John Kennard was a tall slim man who had a rather reserved personality. At the same time, he was quite friendly. I do not know the date of his birth or remember his date of death, but I know he died in the early 1970s and is buried in Odd Fellows Cemetery west of Anderson, Texas.

John lived practically all of his life in Anderson where he worked for The First National Bank of Anderson, eventually serving as its President for a long and successful tenure. He was the President when I worked in the bank during two summers of high school. He was also the loan officer with whom I made my loan to pay for law school.

John Kennard was married three times. First, he married Marybelle Woodroff and there were no children. It is believed that this marriage ended in divorce. Secondly, he married Dorothy Doorman and their marriage also ended in divorce. They had one daughter by this marriage, Katherine (Kay) Kennard McIlyar of Dallas, Texas who married Kent McIlyar, a banker.

There is no mention in any of the family documents I reviewed of a son born to John Kennard in either his first or second marriage. I nevertheless recall that John had a son who had serious problems either with the law, drugs, alcohol (or all three). He only visited his father in Anderson on an occasional basis. I barely remember meeting him a few times when I was quite young. I do not even remember his name. I know that he was a great deal older than me. Once, however, when I was probably in the fourth or fifth grade, I was hanging out with friends at a watermelon vendor's small stand on the side of Highway 90 going through Anderson. John's son was on his way to visit his father driving a black car and stopped at the watermelon stand. He was quite inebriated. After a while, I identified myself as being his cousin. He then remembered who I was. He bought a watermelon. While carrying it on his shoulder to his car, he dropped the watermelon because he was so drunk. It broke in two. He bought another melon and the vendor put it in his car. He then sped away toward John Kennard's house. He obviously was the "black sheep" of the family. My grandmother and father did not like to talk about him. If I mentioned him, they would shake their heads back and forth and cursorily say that the young man caused a lot of trouble for his dad and the rest of the young man's family. I wonder whatever happened to him?

Thirdly, John Kennard married Florence Albrecht, and had two children by that marriage: a daughter, Johanna Kennard Hereford Minter, and a son, Stephen Kennard. Johanna and I were about the same age. We were cousins, classmates and friends. John and Florence Kennard lived next door to my Uncle Kennard Thomas and Aunt Adele. Because my family was at my aunt and uncle's home quite often, I played with Johanna a lot when we were both very young. We were also in the same crowd during junior high and high school in Navasota. We both attended Texas Tech University, and many times made the 8-hour trip together between Lubbock and Grimes County. Her first husband, Richard Hereford, and I were best friends in high school and college. I was best man in their wedding. That marriage ended in divorce, however.

Johanna and I had a good relationship. She died at age 59 on September 16, 2006 from cancer and is buried at Odd Fellows Cemetery near Anderson, Texas. She and Richard Hereford had a daughter, Sarah Hereford Dietrich, of Anderson, Texas born October 20, 1972. Sarah and her husband live in Anderson, and to my knowledge, she and perhaps some of her children are the only descendants of my great grandparents, Papa Kennard and Mama Kennard who live in Anderson or even in Grimes County at this time. That is a bit sad to me.

John Kennard's second son, Stephen Kennard is five or six years younger than me. Stephen attended The University of Texas. He currently lives in New York City, New York where I understand he owns a catering business. He has never been married and has no children.

2. Kennard Thomas Kennard Thomas (Uncle Kennard) was born October 2, 1908 in Anderson, Texas. He graduated from Southwestern University in Georgetown, Texas. Kennard Thomas lived practically all of his life in Anderson. Uncle Kennard was a Vice President of the Anderson bank. I do not believe he ever had another employer. Uncle Kennard married Adele Pollard (Auntie Adele) born September 13, 1903 from Paris, Texas. She was a graduate of Texas Women's University in Denton, Texas, and a teacher in Anderson schools. She was also one who talked "a mile a minute" with a loud voice. All of the family loved her. She was kind and helpful to my grandmother. She and Uncle Kennard did not have children. Uncle Kennard died August 19, 1984. Auntie Adele died September 14, 1990. They are both buried in Odd Fellows Cemetery slightly west of Anderson, Texas.

Uncle Kennard and Auntie Adele were beloved by all in my immediate family and highly regarded by all others in the Kennard family. His nickname for me until about the 6th grade was "Cowboy." That is partly because I rode horses a lot wearing a cowboy hat. If I was in my grandmother's yard as a youngster, when he drove by in his pickup truck he hollered loudly out of the window, "What 'cha doin' Cowboy?" That pleased me every time, and I waved back vigorously.

When I worked at the Anderson Bank during summers of my junior and senior years in high school, I ate my noon meals with Auntie Adele and Uncle Kennard. One of the things we often ate was clabber, which is milk obtained by hand milking a cow (done here by Uncle Jack) that has partially clotted from souring. This was a popular dish of my parents' generation (and before) often eaten cold with crumbled cornbread mixed with the clabber. I liked it if it was "fresh" because it had not soured that much.

Uncle Kennard was a sweet loving man who was loved by all in his family. I felt close to him, especially after the death of my father. I also loved Auntie Adele. My sister felt the same about both of them also.

3. Marion Brown Thomas. This is my father. I will take a little liberty to brag on him and members of my family. Unfortunately, this includes me, the author of this paper. Please bear with me.

Marion Brown Thomas was a graduate of Southwestern University in Georgetown, Texas (near Austin). This is where he met my mother, Virginia Josephine Stewart, who also graduated from that university. While in college, my dad was President of his Kappa Alpha fraternity for two years. He was also Captain of his college football team his senior year.

After his graduation from Southwestern, Marion Brown was elected to the office of Grimes County Superintendent of Schools at the young age of 21 years, defeating two "adults," one of which was the incumbent. He was the youngest person ever elected to that office in the State of Texas. I doubt that record will ever be beaten inasmuch as one must be 21 years old to hold the office. My parents were married in Canyon, Texas in 1935 by her father, Richard Stewart, the Methodist Minister in Canyon at the time.

Virginia and Marion Brown Thomas on their honeymoon in Monterey, Mexico.

My parents lived in Anderson for the years that he held the County Superintendent's office. He left that office to enter World War II and my mother was appointed to complete his term. After the war, my dad worked for the Anderson Bank, but within a couple of years was made City Manager of Navasota, Grimes County, Texas 10 miles west of Anderson. Our family then moved to Navasota in 1948 when I was 9 months old. As City Manager, he ran the business of the city. All departments of the city reported to him including, police, sewage, water, streets, and the like.

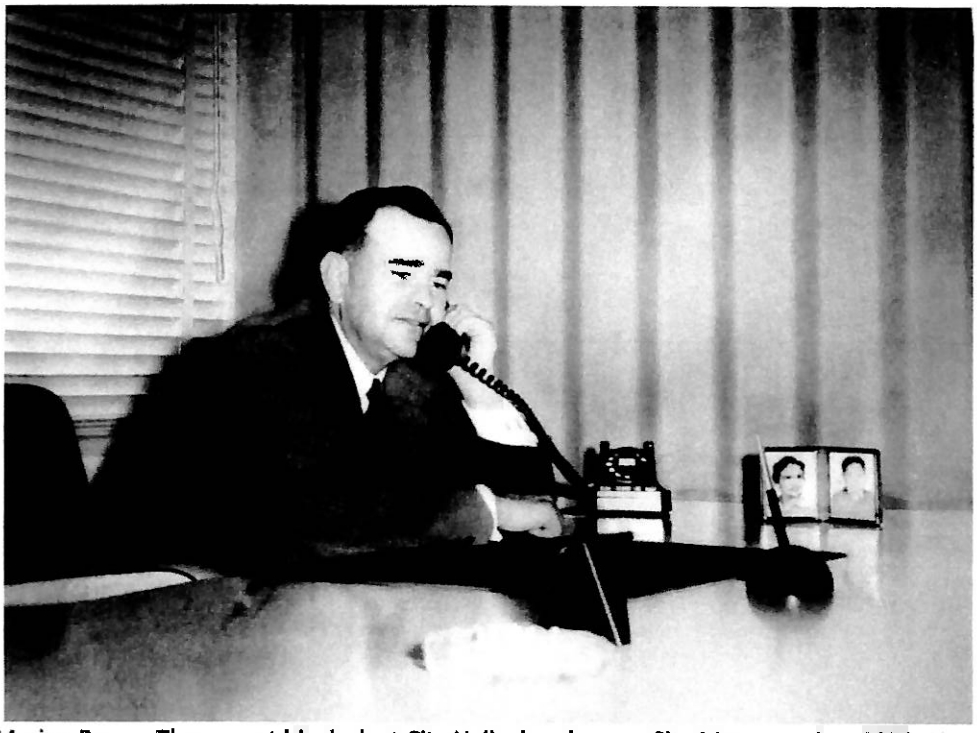
Marion Brown Thomas was Navasota's City Manager for 16 years until his untimely death at age 48. This is an extraordinarily long tenure for any person as City Manager for any size city. He was well known and highly regarded throughout Grimes County. I was 16 years old when he died. We had an extremely close relationship. His death hit me hard. His funeral was attended by more people than any other funeral in the history of Grimes County, at that time. I realized my dad's popularity in the county. That made me very proud. It still does. My mother taught the 6th grade in Navasota for over 30 years. She was well liked in Navasota. She died at the age of 93 on July 31, 2006. My parents are buried in the Navasota Cemetery.



My father, Marion Brown Thomas, at his desk at City Hall when he was City Manager circa 1958. Note my sister's and my photos on his desk.

Marion Brown Thomas was a natural born leader of people. This is demonstrated by him being President of his college fraternity, captain of his college football team, County Superintendent, an officer in the Navy, and City Manager. He was also most gregarious and had a lighter side to his personality. He had a tremendous sense of humor. Dad had one of the most infectious laughs I have ever heard. It was loud. Once when I was in the fourth grade I literally heard him laughing at our house when I was three blocks away.

Marion Brown Thomas. This picture was jokingly intended to imitate him as featured on the cover of Life Magazine in 1958. It was taken at Mary Stewart Thomas' sorority house during Father's Day at The University of Texas.

My parents had two children: My sister, Mary Stewart Thomas Ramsey born June 27, 1939; and me, Richard Gary Thomas born May 15, 1947. Both my sister, and I grew up in Navasota, Texas.

Mary Stewart Ramsey. She has lived most of her adult life in Fort Worth and Dallas, Texas. My sister, Mary Stewart, excelled at just about everything she tried to do. In high school, she was a twirler her sophomore and junior year, drum major her senior year, had good grades, National Honor Society member, football sweetheart, and selected Most Beautiful. She graduated from the University of Texas where she was (1) a member of the service organization Orange Jackets her sophomore year (a big honor), (2) selected as Outstanding Student, (3) President of the Kappa Alpha Theta social sorority, (4) Board of Directors member of the Co-Op Store as a representative of the student body, (5) nominated for Most Beautiful, Bluebonnet Bell, and Sweetheart of the University, and (6) married the President of the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity ("Fijis"). All of these accomplishments, and she made good grades. Since then, she has continued in the same vein. She held many civic related positions both in Fort Worth and Dallas; e.g., President of the Tarrant County Junior League and Chair of the United Way Campaign in Tarrant County. She has spent most of her volunteer time developing an organization for Fort Worth Independent School District to fight adolescent pregnancy, and working with another organization to fight poverty in Dallas, Texas.

My sister is currently married to Jim Ramsey from Kilgore, Texas, a retired lawyer in Dallas beloved in our family. She has three children by her first marriage to I. Jon Brumley which ended in divorce: (1) Marion Virginia Brumley born March 10, 1965 (married to Dr. Steve Singleton) who has two sons, Jake Callen and Jon Thomas; (2) Carla Cay Brumley born May 25, 1967 (married to Tom Brown) who has a stepson, Hunter, and two natural children, Cormac and Francesca; and (3) Jon William Brumley (Jonny) born August 7, 1970, married to Lori Fuhr Brumley, who has three children, Jon William (Will), Anna Brittan, and Muriel Virginia. All of my sister's children are graduates of The University of Texas.

Richard Gary Thomas. I have lived in the Dallas, Texas area (Richardson and Plano) for practically all of my adult life. In high school, I was elected as Student Body President. After high school, I went to Texas Tech University in west Texas where I was a member of the local chapter of Phi Gamma Delta fraternity. I graduated from Texas Tech University in 1969. After undergraduate school, I graduated from St. Mary's University School of Law in San Antonio in 1972. While in law school, I was a member of the scholastic honorary fraternity, and a member of the Law Journal where I served as Associate Editor.

I married the love of my life, Mary Gail Hall Thomas on November 22, 1975 in Dallas, Texas. Mary Gail is a native of Montgomery Alabama and has her Bachelor's and Masters degrees in Secondary Education from Auburn, University. One will never find a more dedicated, spirited, and avid fan of Auburn University football than my wife, Mary Gail.

We have two children. Lee Elizabeth Burnette LaCoume, born June 20, 1964, is technically my stepdaughter, but I consider her to be my natural child in every way. I could not love her more if she was my biological child. Lee attended Kilgore Junior College where she competed with numerous hopefuls to become a Kilgore Rangerette, a nationally renowned drill team. As a Rangerette, Lee performed during halftimes at the annual Cotton Bowl Football game, at the World's Fair in New Orleans, and with the famous comedian-entertainer, Bob Hope. Lee graduated from Texas A&M University and is married to Jim LaCoume of Lake Dallas, Texas. They have two daughters: Haley Elizabeth LaCoume and Riley Amanda LaCoume. Haley LaCoume is a graduate of Oklahoma State University where her sister, Riley, is currently in her junior year. Lee and her husband, Jim LaCoume, currently live two miles from my home in Plano, Texas.

Our son, Gary Walter Thomas, born January 4, 1978, is a graduate of the University of Missouri where he was a member of the Sigma Nu fraternity. He is married to Anna Barton Thomas from Alton, Illinois. She is also a graduate of the University of Missouri where she belonged to the Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority. They live in the St. Louis, Missouri area (Lake St. Louis) and have two children: Caitlin Elizabeth Thomas and Jackson Hall Thomas, both of whom are currently in elementary school. Gary Thomas is quite a successful independent insurance agent and the sole owner of Thomas Insurance Advisors in the St. Louis, Missouri area. He is most accomplished in his field and possesses a uniquely high degree of knowledge and understanding of commercial lines and personal lines insurance coverages. At this time, his agency employs 5 salespeople as well as other staff members.

As for me, the author of this paper, I was in the private practice of law for 43 years in Dallas, Texas, and was the senior partner of Thomas, Feldman, & Wilshusen, LLP. for the 26 years prior to my retirement. For the great majority of my career, I specialized in construction law in Dallas, Texas. I primarily represented commercial subcontractors all over the State of Texas in jury trials, appeals, arbitration hearings, mediations, contract drafting, and dispute avoidance counseling. I truly enjoyed the entire practice of construction law, but my favorite part was jury trials.

During my career, I was honored to speak often to attorneys at construction law seminars around the country and gave innumerable construction law presentations to commercial subcontractor organizations. Further, I had the privilege of representing a commercial subcontractors' organization, the Texas Construction Association, for 24 years. This organization was purposed to represent the interests of subcontractors in the Texas Legislature. As general counsel for that organization, I testified regularly before legislative committees at the State Capitol about pending bills concerning the commercial construction industry. I was the primary author of 8 Texas statutes that became law involving the construction industry. I was by no means, however, a lobbyist. My function was much more technical in nature.

Primarily representing commercial subcontractors was both professionally and personally fulfilling. This is because it is my belief that they are, as a group, taken advantage of and abused more than any other group in business today. Those who know me know that I most enjoy being on the side of the underdog. I fully retired from the practice of law in 2015. I would like to think that I made a small difference to subcontractors through my efforts.

Please note that I failed to mention my many faults and failures. As for my accomplishments, however, I fully and completely acknowledge that they are totally because of the grace of God who gave me certain talents that I did nothing to earn, opened doors, closed other doors, provided opportunities, and guided me in my personal and professional affairs. He did all of this in spite of my occasional stubbornness in thinking I knew what was best for me instead of His Devine will for my life. Without fail, each time I learned that His will is always best. I owe everything to my Father in Heaven.

Mary Stewart Thomas Ramsey, my sister, and Richard Gary Thomas, the author of this paper.

4. JG Thomas. JG Thomas, born November 28, 1924, was the youngest son of my grandparents, Gary and Stella Kennard Thomas. Like his brothers, he graduated from Southwestern University. He later married Charlotte Crawley born January 27, 1931, a graduate of the University of Texas who grew up in a small town, Springhill, close to Longview, Texas. Uncle JG worked in the oil and gas industry in Midland, Texas (West Texas) for Getty Oil Company. That is where he and Aunt Charlotte met.

Uncle JG was transferred to Houston, Texas where he advanced in his career to being the head of the land department of Getty Oil and its successors. He lived in Houston, Texas most of his life. He died on December 8, 2016 at the age of 92, and is buried in Odd Fellows Cemetery near Anderson, Texas.[246] They had two children both residing in the Houston, Texas area: (1) Mary Beth Thomas Reidy (Mary Beth) born May 27, 1957, a graduate of Southwestern University and retired schoolteacher in the Houston area. She married John Reidy. They have two sons, Kyle John Reidy born June 14, 1987, and David Thomas Reidy born February 4, 1992. (2) Uncle JG's second child is Michael Scott Thomas (Scott) born January 27, 1960, who is a graduate of Pepperdine University in California and South Texas School of Law in Houston. He is a practicing attorney in Houston specializing in family law. Scott and his wife, Heather Squires Thomas, have 3 children, Austin Squires Thomas born July 22, 1995, Avery Scott Thomas born January 5, 1998, and Ashley Sarah Thomas born March 24, 2001.

5. John Thomas Hurst. He was born on September 20, 1919 the son of Uncle Jack and Lizzie Kennard Hurst, and was known as "Jack Jr." On October 11, 1946, he married Mary Elizabeth Palm, born September 25, 1922. Mary's mother was of the Meachum family, a long time and prominent family in Anderson, Texas. Mary, however, grew up in Austin, Texas. Both Jack Jr. and Mary were graduates of the University of Texas, with Jack Jr. graduating in 1939. They were married after World War II and lived all of their adult lives in Austin. He served as President and Director of TexWood Furniture Corporation for nearly 30 years and was involved as well in the ownership and management of Transportation Enterprises, Inc. and the Texas Warrant Company. He also served many years as a member of the Board of Directors of the First National Bank of Anderson, and raised cattle on the land he inherited from his parents originating from Michael Moore Kennard. It was he and his wife, Mary, who on one tract of this inherited land restored the historic country home of Michael Moore Kennard. As of this writing, the land and the house is still owned and enjoyed by his children.

Jack Jr. and Mary had four children. The oldest was John Thomas Hurst, II (Tommy) with whom I spent a lot of time in my youth. He visited his grandparents in Anderson on weekends and during summers like I did. We rode horses and spent many nights together at each other's grandparents' homes. His grandfather, Uncle Jack, taught us both how to hunt. Tommy graduated from the University of Texas as well as the University of Texas School of Law. He is also a Certified Public Accountant. He chose, however, not to practice either law or accounting so that he could be a computer programmer in his hometown of Austin, Texas.

The second child of Jack Jr. and Mary is Mary Elizabeth (Betty) Hurst who graduated from Rice University which has been well known for academic excellence for many decades. Afterward, Betty graduated from the University of Texas School of Law. She currently practices real estate law in Austin, Texas where she lived most of her life. The third child is Sharon Hurst Hibbert also a University of Texas graduate She is married to James E. Hibbert, a Southern Methodist University graduate who works with J. P. Morgan where he is involved in lending investment bank work – outs and risk assessments. They live in Houston, Texas where at one point she was in the banking industry as well. Sharon is the mother of three sons all of whom live in Houston: (a) James E Hibbert, Jr. who works for Texas Capital Bank and is involved the oil and gas industry; (b) John Edward Hibbert, is in the oil and gas industry in the field of Finance; and (3) Clarkson P. Hibbert, is in the real estate lending industry. Currently Sharon Hurst Hibbert serves as a member of the Board of Directors of the First National Bank of Anderson originally founded by our great grandfather, John H. Kennard.

The fourth child of Jack Jr. and Mary Hurst is Dr. Edward Hurst, M.D., who initially attended Dartmouth College in New Hampshire, but later transferred to the University of Texas where he obtained his undergraduate degree. Edward then obtained his medical degree from the University of Texas Medical Branch in Galveston, Texas. Edward married his wife, Denise in 1988 and they have two children: Brenna and Eric. Edward is currently an ophthalmologist who practices in Rockwall, Texas.

Jack Hurst, Jr. died on January 3, 2005, and is buried in Odd Fellows Cemetery near Anderson, Texas. His wife, Mary, died August 12, 2014. She was cremated and half of her ashes were spread in Austin and the other half at Odd Fellows Cemetery.

6. Descendants of John H. and Hattie B. Kennard in World War II

A. Children of Brown Kennard. – Uncle Brown had one son, John H. Kennard who was a young man at the time of the war. While I do not know for sure that he served in the armed forces in World War II, I am under the definite impression that he was in the Army. I seem to remember seeing pictures of him in an army uniform during that era.

B. Children of Stella Kennard Thomas. – My grandmother's husband (and my grandfather), Gary Thomas, was a member of the local Draft Board that decided which young men in the locale would be drafted into military service during World War II. It reflects his high standing in the community, but it was a thankless job in choosing who would be required to fight in the war, knowing that some of them would be killed and that others would suffer horrific experiences.

World War II, presented Americans with a real threat to our very way of life, culture, democratic form of government, type of judicial system, and indeed, our very identity and existence. If we lost the war, we would likely live under an oppressive dictatorship and our national language would likely be either German or Japanese. Because of the serious nature of this threat, enumerable young men willingly and even anxiously volunteered for military service during World War II, but those who did not do so were subject to being drafted for service.

All three of Stella and Gary Thomas' sons were of military age when the war started by Japan's surprise attack at Pearl Harbor in Hawaii. Kennard, Marion Brown, and JG were all eligible for the draft. Shortly after the U.S. declared war with Japan and Germany, those three brothers met to discuss what they should do about military service. Since their father was a member of the draft board, they realized the difficult position he would face in deciding whether to draft his three sons to fight, or resist doing so while forcing other people's children to go to war. To avoid forcing their father into making that decision, the three brothers decided to volunteer for military service. They all joined the U.S. Navy.

a. Kennard Thomas was assigned to merchant ships transporting goods, materials, weapons and troops to Europe. Of course, naval destroyers were assigned to protect the merchant ships from enemy attacks, but the merchant ships were definitely exposed to surprise enemy submarine and aerial strikes. This made for fearful and nervous times for Uncle Kennard, but fortunately none of his ships were actually attacked. Uncle Kennard told me about going through boot camp in Virginia. The Navy, at the beginning of the war, was completely unprepared for the large number of recruits they had to handle. They were quartered in temporary Quonset huts that had no heat other than a single wood stove at one end of the building, totally insufficient for the very cold Virginia winters. He said he stayed extremely cold and sick the entire time of boot camp. The expressions on his face and body language while talking about this showed this was a miserable experience for him. He was in his mid thirties at the time.

b. JG Thomas was assigned to perform weather duties for the Navy. He spent a lot of time training in the Corpus Christie area. He eventually ended up in Russian Siberia launching weather balloons and interpreting the data transmitted from them with a view of predicting weather in various locations where American or Allied Troops (including Russian Troops) were conducting the war. He faced no enemy combat. On the other hand, they were only housed in tents in the dangerously cold climate of Siberia. Although they were well-constructed tents, still they were only tents that provided limited protection from the extremely cold adverse weather encountered in Siberia. Plus, their work was performed outside. The sub-zero temperatures Uncle JG encountered were dangerously treacherous, but he returned home safely.

b. Marion Brown Thomas, my father, was an officer in the navy. For the first couple of years of the war, he had easy states-side duty being in charge of those who taught radar which was very new at the beginning of the war. He knew absolutely nothing about radar, but the military concluded that he must know about teaching since he was a County School Superintendent. Never mind that he had never taught a day of school. On the other hand, he had experience supervising teachers.

My dad was first stationed in Pasco, Washington followed by St. Simons Island, Georgia for the first 2 years of his service. My mother and sister lived with him in those locations. My sister has clear memories of living in those locations. She also has typical childhood photos of that experience. Then, however, Daddy was assigned to duty in the Pacific Theatre against Japan. His ship was an aircraft carrier named the USS Rudyerd Bay. He was in charge of the men operating the ship's radar below deck.

My father was in a number of significant battles in the Pacific. Two of the major ones were the island battles of Iwo Jima and Okinawa. His ship provided bomber planes and fighter planes for those battles. The type of combat Marion Brown Thomas personally experienced were attacks by Japanese Kamikaze airplanes. Kamikazes were airplanes piloted by Japanese men who were to commit suicide by flying their aircraft into enemy ships aiming for their most vulnerable spots, usually the water line on the side of the ships. The planes did not posses enough fuel for a return trip to their base, and the pilots were chained into the aircraft. Battling this type of enemy was most dangerous and it tended to mentally intimidate the American sailors.

During the Kamikaze attacks, my father's battle station was usually in the radar room below deck as the officer in charge. They could hear the battle noises above, never knowing whether the next sound would result in their death. He said that during a Kamikaze attack, each friendly ship was gruesomely in competition with each other. The ones that fired the most anti-aircraft projectiles were less likely to be the ship that the Kamikaze pilots chose to try to sink.

The fleet to which my father's ship belonged was involved in one particular battle where a U.S. aircraft carrier was badly hit and sunk by a Kamikaze plane. This happened during the battle of Iwo Jima. The ship sunk was the USS Bismarck Sea.[247] All sailors abandoned ship. The ship did not sink immediately. Dad went on deck after the battle and witnessed the large bellowing black smoke coming from the sinking ship and men abandoning ship by jumping into the water. It moved him greatly. The only way he ever described it was by saying while his head slowly shook from side to side: "That was quite a sight for this old country boy."

Men of my father's generation were not quick to show their feelings and emotions. Nevertheless, the tone of his voice clearly communicated the emotion he in fact felt. He was clearly moved. My father was neither an uneducated nor culturally unsophisticated "country boy." This is the way he felt most comfortable expressing his emotions triggered by the events he witnessed. He saw massive black smoke coming from the hopelessly damaged and sinking ship. He saw people dead, dying, and desperately jumping into the dangerous ocean in an attempt to save their lives. Even though the sinking aircraft carrier was bigger than Dad's ship, it was like the carrier my father was on. Daddy knew this could be his fate too.

Parenthetically, I have an electronic copy of forms filled out by the USS Rudyerd Bay crewmembers during one of their reunions after the war. They were given written questionnaires about their experiences on the ship. One of the questions asked them was, "What Is Your Worst Memory?" A high percentage of them answered, "The Burning and Sinking of the Bismarck Sea by Jap Suicide Planes" or something similar. It shows that the event had the same moving effect on my dad's fellow crewmembers as on him. The sinking of the USS Bismarck Sea tragically resulted in the deaths of 318 men out of a crew of 923.[248]

Dad was also in the battle of Okinawa where the most intense, and most costly Kamikaze attacks occurred.[249] Numerous ships were lost. Dad, however, had no specific stories about this battle, unless this is the battle where the Admiral's ordered maneuver would have required my Dad's ship to go through survivors of a sunken ship

When the ship was not actively engaged in battle, Dad was sometime stationed on the ship's bridge, the topside platform from which the ship is commanded. During the aftermath of a Kamikaze battle, Dad was stationed on the bridge of the ship with the Captain and other officers. The Fleet's Admiral, who was located on another ship, ordered the ships of the fleet to make a certain maneuver. Hearing the order, Dad noticed that the effect of that maneuver would have his ship running straight through and over the helpless sailors in the water who had abandoned their sinking ship. This would kill many if not most of those men. Dad immediately told the Captain who then confirmed that my father's observation was correct.

The Captain quickly radioed the Admiral asking permission not to carry out the maneuver for his ship to avoid the helpless men. The Admiral denied the request stating that the well being of the rest of the ships in the fleet were more important than the lives that would be lost in the ocean. My dad then watched his Captain painfully decide whether to follow the order. The Captain decided not to run over the helpless men in the sea. To knowingly disobey an Admiral's order was most serious and unorthodox. He radioed the Admiral of his decision. It was not well received.

The Captain then performed a most skillful maneuvering of his ship "threading" between the other ships in the fleet carrying out the Admiral's order while totally avoiding a collision with several of them. The men in the water lived. The Captain, however, lost his commission and the command of his ship. His career in the Navy was ended.

It is unknown whether this event happened immediately after the Iwo Jima Kamikaze attack when the USS Bismarck Sea was sunk, during the intense Kamikaze attacks of Okinawa, or an attack at another location. I have the impression that it was not the sinking of the USS Bismarck Sea during Iwo Jima, but that impression is quite vague.

Dad told another heart breaking story involving the hard and fast rule that the naval ships could never turn on their lights at night under any circumstances. The purpose was to prevent the lights from revealing US ship locations to enemy submarines lurking in the waters on the hunt for US ships to torpedo and sink.

On one particular occasion, my father was stationed in the radar room where the loudspeaker was located to broadcast radio communications between the ship and the pilots who were in the air. Accordingly, Dad could hear everything that was said between the pilots and the ship. One evening an American pilot ran out of daylight returning to Dad's ship from a mission. The pilot radioed that it was too dark for him to find the ship for his return, and requested that the lights be turned on briefly so he could find the ship. The request was denied for the well being of the ship, its crew, and the rest of the fleet.

The pilot repeatedly pleaded with the ship's radioman for the ship to turn on its lights if only briefly. Everyone in the radar room, including my father, could hear the pilot's pleas, and it was most disturbing. The ship denied each request. Again and again, the pilot reported he was running out of fuel and begged the ship to turn on its lights. Nothing, however, could be done. The lights could not be turned on for the safety of the ship. Finally, the pilot asked the ship's radioman to contact the pilot's wife and tell her he loved her. The radioman acknowledged that he would see that it happened. The distraught pilot then gave the radioman information to contact the wife. Shortly thereafter, conversation from the plane ceased. He ditched his plane in the nighttime water. Nothing was ever heard from the pilot again.

It had to be awful to hear the conversations between the ship and the pilot. Daddy heard all of it. One thing was very clear. That memory was most painful for Dad. That was clear as he told the story. Having to hear those pleas for a protracted period was emotionally wrenching for him and anyone else who heard them.

Marion Brown Thomas during World War II.

All of the Stella Kennard Thomas sons returned unharmed after the conclusion of the war. Thank the Lord. She regularly mentioned how thankful she was for that.

C. Children of Lizzie Kennard Hurst. – Lizzie and Jack Hurst had one son, Jack Hurst, Jr. He volunteered for military service and served in the Army Air Corps. This was before the formation of the U.S. Air Force. He was a navigator on B-17 bomber planes and was in active combat against German forces in Europe. The bombing assignments presented some of the most dangerous combat faced by U.S. military men in World War II. A tour of duty for B-17 crewmen flying missions over Germany in World War II was 25 missions. Only 1 in 4 crewmen flying these missions made a complete tour of duty.[250] Jack Jr. had by far the most treacherous and nerve-racking experiences of the Grimes County Kennards in World War II. He was most fortunate to have survived.

Jack Jr. told the story of his plane being shot down in enemy controlled territory and his eventual escape to freedom. Jack Jr. made a written account of his plane being downed by the German Air Force during a bombing raid. It was provided me by his son, Tommy Hurst. I have added a few statements from general research to supplement information about this event.

Also, by the time I was in the 5th or 6th grade, I had been told short summaries of this experience by my dad. I was most curious to hear a more complete version. I asked Jack Jr.'s son and my good friend, Tommy, if he thought it would be too upsetting for his dad to tell us the story. I was concerned about unnecessarily recounting such a story with many bad memories. Tommy did not think that would be the case and asked his father if he would mind telling us the story. Jack Jr. agreed.

He told this story to his son, me, with his father, Uncle Jack present. We were in Aunt Lizzie and Uncle Jack's living room during the wintertime where there was a log fire burning in the fireplace, our only source of heat for that room. This was only 14 or 15 years after these events occurred. These memories were relatively fresh on his mind. He was reserved, but his emotions were not entirely hidden because they were visible in his facial expressions. His written version is most similar to his verbal rendition, but is written objectively and lacks the emotions and facial expressions shown during his verbal rendition. Jack Jr. stared directly into the fireplace fire and his eyes did not move during the entire story. Uncle Jack occasionally put fresh logs on the fire during the story. A combined summary of the written and oral accounts follows below.

Jack Jr. was a navigator for "Heavy Bomber" planes in the European Theatre. In England on October 20, 1943, Jack Jr. was assigned to a B-17 aircraft. The mission of his squadron was to bomb a rail junction in Duren, Germany connecting Cologne, Germany with Paris, France. Germany occupied and controlled at the time. Five minutes away from the target in Duren, Germany, the bomb bay doors were opened reducing the speed of the plane appreciably.

After experiencing anti-aircraft fire from the Germans that produced heavy flak, it slacked off when the squadron approached the German target. The bombardier of his plane ordered the bombs to be released over the target. After the bombs were released, all of the bomb bay doors closed for the other planes in the squadron, "but alas, our doors did not close." While the other American planes proceeded back to base at faster speeds, the crew of Jack Jr.'s plane had to manually close their doors. These events slowed them down appreciably. That left them all alone and separated from the rest of the squadron, "not a comfortable feeling." Navigator, Jack Jr., directed the plane to fly back to their base by going between the large Dutch cities of Rotterdam and Amsterdam. At that time, Holland (the Netherlands) where the Dutch live, was also occupied and controlled by Germany.

Soon his plane was surrounded with Luftwaffe (German Air Force) fighter planes that began firing on Jack Jr.'s plane while over the Netherlands. The attack upon them was severe. During the attack, Jack Jr. noticed bullet holes in the fuselage. The bombardier who shared Jack Jr.'s compartment in the plane then fell wounded. Two engines were on fire and 3 crewmembers had been killed. His plane was crashing. The remaining crew had to parachute out of the plane in an effort to save their lives.

All airmen were trained to wait 60 seconds after jumping to open their parachutes to avoid the parachute from getting tangled up in the plane. Jack Jr. helped the wounded bombardier to the emergency exit. Following his best judgment under the circumstances, Jack Jr. made an exception to what they were taught. He told the bombardier to pull his ripcord as soon as he jumped in order to avoid passing out and being unable to do so. The bombardier did so and his parachute successfully deployed. Jack Jr. then jumped out of the plane. Being uninjured, he was able to follow his training by not pulling the ripcord for about 60 seconds. This made his landing location far away from the other crew.

Three of the other crewmembers jumped together and were spotted by the German planes. They were readily captured after landing. Jack Jr., on the other hand, landed about 1-½ miles away from them in a plowed field. Surely the soft plowed soil favorably affected his landing which was safely done. However, a mean Jersey bull was near. They have a reputation for being mean and aggressive. The bull charged but Jack Jr. was able to get out of the field successfully. It would have indeed ben ironic and tragic for him to survive the fighter plane attack and the emergency parachute jump only to be injured (or worse) by a Jersey bull.

It would be 3 months of nerve racking and dangerous experiences before he returned to England. He was reported as missing-in-action. One can only imagine the mental anguish his parents, Aunt Lizzie and Uncle Jack, suffered during those 3 months.

Hitler's Germany forcibly occupied the Netherlands during the war. Naturally, most Dutchmen did not sympathize with the Germans. There was an active "Underground" in Holland.[251] Their primary activity was hiding Jews, Allied soldiers, and others from the Germans.[252] Its members, however, were in constant danger from the Germans.

Soon after landing, Jack Jr. met a sympathetic Dutchman who helped him out of his gear and they then left on bicycles.[253] Somehow, Jack Jr. soon came in contact with a nurse who was brave enough to hide him in her home and permitted him to stay with her for two weeks. Her father was quite active against the Germans. Both the father and daughter were apparently a part of the Dutch Underground. Although food was in short supply, they shared their rations with Jack Jr. His crewmembers, however, were not as fortunate. Most (if not all) of them were captured, especially the injured ones. Soon, they were taken to prison camps where they could well have been mistreated or worse.

Meanwhile, the Dutch Underground was trying to determine if Jack Jr. was a German imposter. They asked him many questions. For example, what was served for breakfast at his English base the morning they took off for the bombing run. Obviously the Underground was informed by the Allies of the correct answer. Jack Jr. "passed" the test and was then informed he would be put on a submarine to escape the country. At each point of this story, events could result in his capture or death. In his verbal rendition, he stated he lived in constant fear of being betrayed by one of the people "helping" him because of them being a secret German agent or an opportunistic native of the area seeking favor from the Germans.

He spent a couple of weeks at Doorn, Netherlands before leaving to go south to meet the submarine, but it never materialized. Instead, they rode bicycles to the border of Belgium, which was also forcibly occupied and controlled by the German army. A simple waive at the sentry inexplicably resulted in their crossing the border without incident. Had the sentry been bribed or was he simply sympathetic? They proceeded by car to Brussels, Belgium where he was kept in a house of ill repute. Then, a lady and her daughter took Jack Jr. to their home. After a while, he proceeded to the crossing of the Belgian-French border. France was also forcibly occupied by Germany at that time.

The Belgium Underground prepared a fake passport for him. To cross the border into France, Jack Jr. played the role of a mute painter. They approached the crossing at 4:00 a.m. when many factory workers moved back and forth each day. He saw two German guards. One of the French guards did not like Jack Jr.'s passport. As the German guards approached, the only question became how much money for him to cross into France. The guard was paid-off and they quickly proceeded to a nearby rail station and boarded a train to Paris. Ironically, this was the same railroad line his squadron in Germany bombed and tried to destroy. In the train, "a very frightened American Lieutenant had his noon meal along with the elite of the German military." It is difficult for one to imagine the stress he experienced during this train ride.

The French also had a strong Underground that actively fought the Germans with noticeable successes, again at great danger to their personal safety. Many were captured, tortured, and executed.[254] Jack Jr.'s Paris stay was short. His keepers were most uneasy at that time. They got on another train to Lyon, France where he was met by another French Underground member. They proceeded south. Jack Jr. was over 6 feet tall and felt uncomfortably conspicuous with his light colored skin among the shorter darker skinned native French people. To obscure his height discrepancy, he walked in the gutter to blend-in better. It made him appear shorter. They moved south headed for what turned out to be the most harrowing part of the journey.

By this time, Jack Jr. was with other escapees some of which spoke different languages. They forded a very cold river in the middle of December 1943. They were to cross the Pyrenees Mountains to enter Spain. Spain's military dictator at the time, Franco, was ideologically sympathetic to Germany and Hitler. That was the major reason Germany never invaded Spain. On the other hand, Brittan had provided much needed aid to Franco during the recent Spanish Civil war. Truthfully, the Spanish people were deeply divided on where their loyalties should lie. Franco never formally aligned with the Axis powers and continued to maintain a formal Embassy relationship with Britain. The English Ambassador to Spain was allowed to remain in Spain during the war.[255]

Jack Jr. states: "The trip through the Pyrenees (Mountains) was of short duration, only 8 days, but contained a lifetime of experiences." They were 15 in number when they began, travelling all night each night, and hiding out all day. Their guides for the trip through the mountains were Catalons who were known to be unreliable, dishonest, and untrustworthy. "Lower creatures never inhabited the earth. . . . For a price these Catalons would do anything."

During his verbal rendition, I recall Jack Jr. saying that he and the others constantly worried about the Catalons betraying them and turning them over to the Germans, should the Germans pay the Catalons to do so.

The group traversed the mountainous countryside, crossing many vineyards, and never using a road or pathway. Walking must have been most difficult. In addition, the Catalons beat them on their backs with sticks, presumably to make them travel faster but possibly just for meanness. They only ate food obtained from the countryside and traveled by night. One of the travelers carried a valise that hampered his speed and prevented him from keeping up with the rest of the group. He was repeatedly warned to keep up or else. Finally, one of the Catalone guides, "placed his foot in the middle of the man's rear end and booted him off the cliff" to his death! One can only imagine the impression this left upon Jack Jr. and his fellow escapees.

The feet of another person in the group became frostbitten causing him to turn-himself -in at a monastery. He was captured by the Germans. That left 13 cold and weary escapees.

One morning they ran into a German patrol. They scattered "like a covey of quail." The German patrol acquired bloodhounds, and soon 10 of the remaining escapees were captured. That left only 3 escapees. The Germans were still after them with their dogs. The three were exhausted and Jack Jr. took a Benzedrine pill for a needed surge of energy. They traveled a mountain stream to cover their scent from the bloodhounds as well as their footprints. During his verbal account, Jack Jr. told how they constantly heard the dogs barking while tracking them. A slight inflexion of his voice at that point revealed the fear he experienced then.

Soon they were in Spain where the guides deserted them in a field of tall grass! They were all alone in a completely foreign country where they did not speak the language. It was in that field where they spent Christmas day, worried about their plight. Somehow, they ended up in a friendly Spaniard's home where they were given food and drink that was very much needed. The next day, the three caught a train to Barcelona, Spain where they went to the British Embassy. Amazingly, the Catalone guides were there too awaiting payment for their "services." At that point, it had been 30 days since Jack Jr. left Paris. He had not had a bath that entire time. The three escapees went to a public bath, removed their clothes to never touch them again, and took a much needed and welcomed bath. His written account does not mention how they got their new clothes for walking outside of the bath.

From Barcelona, Spain they went to Madrid by car under the British Flag, the "Union Jack." In Madrid, they were met by the British Ambassador himself and stayed in the British Embassy. On New Years Eve of 1943, he was supplied British stout beer, and he and two Indian soldiers had quite a noisy New Years Eve. India at that time was a part of the British Empire. From Madrid, Spain, a friendly boat captain allowed Jack Jr. to leave Spain by boat to Gibraltar, an English Territory located at the southern tip of Spain. At last, he was totally free!

Jack Jr.'s ordeal was no doubt very much physically taxing in the extreme and mentally stressful in the worst way. At any point, he could have easily been killed or captured followed by torture and death. Missing from this story, however, is the emotional stress his mother, Aunt Lizzie, and father, Uncle Jack, as well as the rest of the Grimes County Kennard family and friends experienced during this time. We cannot forget that no one at home knew whether Jack Jr.'s status. Was he dead, wounded, captured and suffering in a German prison, or alive and in the dangerous process of escaping? The uncertainty must have been very hard to cope with. Maintaining hope and avoiding depression had to be difficult for Aunt Lizzie and Uncle Jack. You can bet that they shed tears during that time. My grandmother could only shake her head back and forth while starring at the floor when describing her concern for her sister, Aunt Lizzie, and brother-in-law, Uncle Jack, while Jack Jr. was missing in action. That does not even address my grandmother's own personal concern over her nephew, Jack Jr., which came through clearly when she talked about it. Everyone in Anderson and especially all of the Grimes County Kennards were elated upon learning that Jack Jr. was unharmed, safe, healthy, and free. The most grateful and happy, however, were his parents, Aunt Lizzie and Uncle Jack.

After the war, Jack Jr. stayed in regular contact with the Dutch family who took grave risks helping him. He traveled to Holland a number of times and periodically sent them money through the years. He and his wife, Mary, even named their two daughters after two of the women in that family.

Thankfully, none of the descendants of John H. and Hattie Brown Kennard (Papa and Mama Kennard), were killed or seriously injured in World War II. No doubt that Jack Jr. had the most trying experiences during the war, followed by his parents, Lizzie and Jack Hurst. My grandmother, Stella Kennard Thomas and my grandfather, Gary Thomas, also experienced worrisome and stressful times with all three of their sons in harm's way. I can still picture my grandmother from time to time shaking her head back and forth in a thankful manner when she talked about all of her sons coming back from the war safely.

We owe an extreme debt of gratitude to these Kennards who donated years of their lives and endured mental and physical hardships for us and our country.

CONCLUSION

We are not necessarily special because of our ancestors, what they did, or where they came from. Everyone's ancestors came from somewhere and lived during the same eras as did ours. To the contrary, we are what we are by virtue of the grace of God, and to a lesser degree, our individual efforts and beliefs.

Ancestors are, nevertheless, our predecessors who provided a pathway for us. Family heritage is an important part of how we got where we are and provides a partial explanation of who we are. Knowledge of our family heritage is therefore important, but not required, to understand who we are. Learning about our ancestors is, in my opinion, most worthwhile.

Further, we are allowed to be proud of what our ancestors did, the hardships they endured, the risks that they took, and the sacrifices they made that inured to our benefit. The Grimes County and Johnson County Kennards have a right to be proud that our ancestors crossed the Atlantic Ocean when it was treacherous to do so. We have a right to be proud that they lived in Maryland prior to the Revolutionary War against England at least as far back as 1650, and eventually left Maryland for North Carolina and Tennessee. We have a right to take pride in our ancestors moving to Alabama, and becoming some of the initial Anglo-colonists who settled Texas. In doing so, they took both personal and financial risks. They took extreme risks in fighting Indians. They "put it all on the line" by participating in the successful revolt against the Mexican government resulting in Texas' independence. Again, they risked everything in the Civil War, but this time they lost. They financially pulled themselves back up and again "put it all on the line for us" in World War II. I do not know if our heritage is that much different than that of others, but "Yes," we have a right to be proud of our ancestors. I know that I am.

We owe a great deal of gratitude to those of prior generations who thoroughly researched the identity of our ancestors and handed down a record of their efforts; namely, Elizabeth Brown Richardson and Alta K. Patterson. I have not added information to their efforts. Rather, I have tried to combine their family information and interpret it in the light of known history. Hopefully, this added context to their actions. As always, the person who performs a task benefits from it more than anyone else. That is certainly my case. One thing for sure, it was enlightening and personally rewarding.

---

[1] I am unsure how I came into possession of EBR's documents. They came to me from my mother who secured copies of them for me, I believe, after the death of my great aunt Winnie who was married to my great uncle, George Brown Kennard. Doubtless, EBR originally gave the documents to Aunt Winnie who was known to be interested in Kennard family history. It is my firm belief that at least some of the unidentified handwriting on these copies is that of Aunt Winnie.

[2] Patterson, Alta K., Kennard, King, McCubin, Knight and Their Kin, (AKP publisher, 1988) (Library of Congress Catalogue Card No. 88207667).

[3] EBR p. 1

[4] Id.

[5] Id.

[6] EBR pp. 2-4; AKP pp. xi-xiii. All of EBR's research was done before the advent of computers. AKP's research was done before records were stored electronically and readily accessible by desktop, laptop, and even cellular phones. It could be that the use of advanced and modern electronics and other technology will be able to provide direct links of our Kennards to Irish, Scottish, English, and maybe even French ancestors.

[7] AKP p. viii; See chart on unnumbered page between p. 2 and 3 of AKP.

[8] A Dictionary of the English Language – Wikipedia (retrieved April 20, 2018) https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/A_Dictionary_of_the_English_Language

[9] AKP p. viii

[10] EBR p. 5

[11] EBR p. 10;

[12] AKP p. 3

[13] AKP p. 3;

[14] AKP p. 3

[15] AKP p. 3

[16] EBR p. 33;
[17] AKP p. 3. This statement suggests that AKP was at least aware of EBR's conclusion in this regard, and possibly that they collaborated with one another at least to some degree.
[18] EBR p. 5
[19] EBR p. 9
[20] EBR pp. 30 & 31; See generally, EBR p. 28; Also See, EBR p. 33 citing Maryland Historical Magazine Vol. 12, p 61 to the effect that Richard Kennard married the widow of Nathaniel Howell in 1693.
[21] EBR p. 11 & AKP 3.
[22] EBR p. 11, and AKP p. 3. EBR quotes the will and states that it is found in the Maryland Hall of Records, Annapolis, Maryland – Liber 6, year 1688.
[23] Id.
[24] AKP p. 3.
[25] AKP p. 3, citing Maryland Historical Magazine, Vol. 17, Page 61 and stating that this was taken from Liber 10 (x) page 331.
[26] AKP p. 4 & EBR p13. Mary Pullen was married 4 times and widowed 3 times with her 4th married last name being Howard. Both AKP and EBR quote Mary Pullen (Kennard) Howell's Will of 1730 and cites its location being Maryland Hall of Records – Annapolis, Maryland, Liber 21 Folia 659-661.
[27] EBR p. 30
[28] AKP p. 7. This year is based upon the year of his will, 1742, wherein it was stated that he was "very sick." AKP cites Hall of Records – Annapolis Maryland, Liber 21 Folia 659-661 for Nathaniel I's will.
[29] EBR p. 35.
[30] AKP p. 7.
[31] EBR pp. 15-18; AKP p. 5, quoting the document both state as being found in Liber E.I. #2, Folio 405 Maryland Office, Commissioner Land Office – Annapolis, Maryland.
[32] AKP p. 7 (The page is actually unnumbered, but is located immediately before page numbered 8.)
[33] Id.
[34] AKP p. 9.; EBR p. 21, and p.31 (resided in Kent County, Maryland.)
[35] Id.
[36] AKP p. 10.
[37] AKP p. 9.
[38] AKP p. 10
[39] EBR pp. 36-42.
[40] EBR p. 39.
[41] AKP p. 12 & EBR p. 31.
[42] Id.
[43] AKP p. 12.
[44] AKP p. 16.
[45] EBR p. 46
[46] EBR p. 46

[47] EBR p. 47
[48] Tennessee, Retrieved March 11, 2018, https://www.history.com/topics/us-states/tennessee (Sponsored by The History Channel); EBR p.47.
[49] EBR p. 47
[50] EBR p. 47
[51] Westward Expansion, (Retrieved December 11, 2018) http://www.historynet.com/westward-expansion .
[52] EBR p. 46
[53] EBR p. 47
[54] AKP p. 12-16.
[55] EBR p. 47
[56] EBR 31 & 47; AKP 12
[57] EBR p. 31 & 46. The Memorial Stone at his gravesite on his home site in Grimes County, Texas states that he was born in Tennessee, but that is incorrect. He was born in Maryland.
[58] EBR pp. 46 & 47.
[59] EBR p. 47.
[60] EBR p. 76.
[61] EBR 47 & 71.
[62] AKP pp. 15-16.
[63] EBR p. 47, 52 (p. 52 appears to be out of sequence).
[64] History of Alabama, (Retrieved April 29, 2018) https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/History_of_Alabama.
[65] EBR p. 47.
[66] Id. EBR cites Alabama Territorial Papers Vo. 18, Page 410.
[67] Id.
[68] T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, (American Legacy Press, 1983, p. 133).
[69] Id. at p. 134.
[70] Id. at p. 135.
[71] Id. See also, Bill Neeley, The Last Comanche Chief, p. 17 (Castle Books, 1995, 2007 ed.)
[72] Id. at p. 136.
[73] Id.
[74] Spain Accepts Mexican Independence, Retrieved April 30, 2018, https://www.history.com/this-day-in-history/spain-accepts-mexican-independence.
[75] T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, (American Legacy Press, 1983, p. 138 and 142).
[76] Long, Christopher, The Old Three Hundred, https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/umo01 (Retrieved on May 1, 2018) (Sponsored by Texas State Historical Association).
[77] Id. at p. 144.
[78] Sterling C. Robertson, http://www.lsjunction.com/people/robertsn.htm (Retrieved May 1, 2018); See also, McLean, Malcom D., https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/fro34 (Retrieved May 1, 2018) (Sponsored by Texas State Historical Association.).

[79] EBR p. 51.
[80] EBR p. 48;
[81] T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, p. 164 (American Legacy Press, 1983).
[82] Id. at p. 135 (American Legacy Press, 1983).
[83] See, T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, p.171 (American Legacy Press, 1983)
[84] Id. at p. 169.
[85] EBR p. 48.
[86] EBR p. 49.
[87] Id.
[88] Id.
[89] Id.
[90] Id.
[91] EBR 68.
[92] EBR p. 49.
[93] Id.
[94] EBR p. 49 and 50. EBR states that Anthony Drew received an additional labor of land from the Mexican Government on March 21, 1838 as evidenced by "Application no. 126", and that the older sons received ¼ of a league of land. That date, however, is difficult to reconcile with the date of Texas' independence from Mexico in the year of 1836.
[95] EBR p. 81.
[96] EBR p. 61-62.
[97] S. Moore, Last Stand of the Texas Cherokees, p.7 (RAM Books 2009).
[98] Id.
[99] Id.
[100] Id.
[101] T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, (American Legacy Press, 1983, p. 135); S. Moore Last Stand of the Texas Cherokees, (RAM Books 2009) p. 7-8.
[102] S. Moore Last Stand of the Texas Cherokees, (RAM Books 2009) p. 7; T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, p. 166 (American Legacy Press, 1983); EBR p. 53; Why Did Mexico Want Americans To Settle In Texas, http://www.answers.com/Q/Why_did_Mexico_want_Americans_to_settle_in_Texas#slide=2 Retrieved May 6, 2018.
[103] T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, p. 166-167 (American Legacy Press, 1983).
[104] Bill Neeley, The Last Comanche Chief, p. 18 (Castle Books, 1995, 2007 ed.)
[105] EBR p. 54.
[106] EBR pp. 54 and 90-91; Kemp, L.W. Coleman, Robert M., https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/fco18, Retrieved August 3, 2018 (Sponsored by Texas State Historical Association.
[107] EBR pp. 90-91

[108] EBR p. 61, quoting "Blair's Early History of Grimes County;" EBR p. 94 quoting W. P. Zuber, a long time family friend.
[109] Kemp, L.W., Coleman, Robert M., https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/fco18 (sponsored by Texas State Historical Association), Retrieved February 7, 2018.
[110] EBR p.54.
[111] Id.
[112] Id.
[113] Id. It should be noted that Fort Parker is the location where Cynthia Ann Parker was kidnapped by the Comanche one year later in 1836. She assimilated with the Comanche tribe and was the mother of the last and most famous marauding Comanche Chiefs, Quanah Parker. See, T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, pp. 449 – 451, 543 - 550 (American Legacy Press, 1983); Cynthia Ann Parker is Kidnapped, https://www.history.com/this-day-in-history/cynthia-ann-parker-is-kidnapped Retrieved on December 17, 2018 (Sponsored by The Texas State Historical Association); B.C. Hosmer, Parker, Quannah, https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/fpa28 Retrieved on December 17, 2018 (Sponsored by The Texas State Historical Association). Also see, S.C. Gwynne Empire of the Summer Moon, (Scribner, NY, NY. 2010), an excellent and well researched account that traces the rise and fall of the Comanche with an emphasis upon Quanah Parker, the last and perhaps greatest warrior – chief, and his mother, Cynthia Ann Parker. The book was nominated for a Pulitzer Prize, and is full of gripping accounts of tensions and battles between the white man representing western civilization and the native Indian culture. Also see, Bill Neeley, The Last Comanche Chief, (Castle Books 1995, 2007 ed.) which is a book about the life and times of Quanah Parker). Parenthetically, it was Cynthia Ann's uncle, a minister, who married Henry Fanthorpe and Rachael Kennard, the daughter of Anthony Drew and Sarah Moore Kennard.
[114] EBR pp. 54 and 55.
[115] EBR p.55.
[116] See generally, Barker, Eugene C. and Pohl, James W., https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/qdt01, Retrieved August 3, 2018, (Sponsored by Texas Historical Assoc.); Unnamed Author and Title, http://www2.austincc.edu/lpatrick/his1693/causes.html, Retrieved August 3, 2018; T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, (American Legacy Press, 1983, Ch. 6 pp. 152-173);
[117] T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, (American Legacy Press, 1983, p. 165); Bishop, Curtis, Law of April 6, 1830, Retrieved February 8, 2018 https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/ngl01 (sponsored by Texas State Historical Association); J. Long, Duel of Eagles: The Mexican and U.S. Fight For the Alamo, p. 37 (William Morrow and Company, Inc. 1990)
[118] T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, (American Legacy Press, 1983, p. 169)
[119] Bishop, Curtis, Law of April 6, 1830, https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/ngl01, Retrieved August 3, 2018.

[120] T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, p. 176 (American Legacy Press, 1983,); P. Lack, The Texas Revolutionary Experience: A Political and Social History 1835-1836, p. 3 (Texas A&M Press College Station 1992).
[121] T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, p. 184 (American Legacy Press, 1983)
[122] Dr. Winders, Bruce, Federalism vs. Centralism: Why It Matters To The Texas Revolution, https://medium.com/@OfficialAlamo/federalism-vs-centralism-why-it-matters-to-the-texas-revolution-190af0b89881; Retrieved August 3, 2018.
[123] T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, (American Legacy Press, 1983, p. 174) p. 185
[124] Id.
[125] Bill Neeley, The Last Comanche Chief, p. 17 (Castle Books, 1995, 2007 ed.)
[126] T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, p. 175 (American Legacy Press, 1983); J. Long, Duel of Eagles: The Mexican and U.S. Fight For the Alamo, pp. 22-23 (William Morrow and Company, Inc. 1990).
[127] P. Lack, The Texas Revolutionary Experience: A Political and Social History 1835-1836, p. 3 (Texas A&M Press College Station 1992)
[128] Texas Declaration of Independence, https://www.tsl.texas.gov/treasures/republic/declare-01.html, Retrieved on December 17, 2018 (Sponsored by the Texas State Library and Archive Commission).
[129] Id.
[130] T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, p. 183 (American Legacy Press, 1983)
[131] Id. at pp. 187-189; Fitts, Susan Love, Anderson: The Stylish old Fanthorpe Inn, an oasis in Texas' earliest days https://www.chron.com/news/article/Anderson-The-stylish-Old-Fanthorp-Inn-an-oasis-2053211.php Retrieved on May 12, 2018 (Article from Houston Chronicle January 28,2001).
[132] EBR at p. 61, quoting from Blair's early History of Grimes County Texas.
[133] T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, p. 219 (American Legacy Press, 1983).
[134] Id at pp. 219 and 214.
[135] See generally, The Texas Revolutionary Experience: A Political and Social History 1835-1836 p. 222-230 (Texas A&M Press College Station 1992); Covington, Carolyn Calloway, Runaway Scrape Retrieved on February 8, 2018 https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/pfr01 (sponsored by Texas State Historical Association); Taylor, Lonn, The Runaway Scrape Retrieved on February 8, 2018 https://roundtop.com/the-runaway-scrape/
[136] EBR p. 59, citing an "item" published in the Vol. 5 Texas Historical Quarterly p. 4.
[137] Gambrell, Herbert, Jones, Anson, (Retrieved on February 8, 2018) https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/fjo42 (Sponsored by The Texas Historical Association.)
[138] EBR p. 55.
[139] EBR p. 61, quoting Blair's Early History of Grimes County Texas (The remaining citation information is not in EBR's paper.)

[140] EBR p. 57, (Derived from Comptrollers Military Service Records found in Texas State Archives, Texas State Library, Austin, Texas).
[141] EBR p. 58, (Derived from Comptrollers Military Service Records found in Texas State Archives, Texas State Library, Austin, Texas).
[142] Battle of San Jacinto, https://www.history.com/topics/battle-of-san-jacinto (Retrieved on May 5, 2018; T.R. Fehrenbach, Lone Star: A History of Texas and the Texans, p. 232 (American Legacy Press, 1983)
[143] Treaties of Velasco, https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/mgt05 (sponsored by Texas State Historical Association).
[144] EBR p. 55 and p. 65 citing Paddock History of Texas Fort Worth And The Texas Northwest Edition, Vol. III, p. 184. It should be noted that William Everett Kennard's name is not included as participant of that battle in McDonald, Johnnie Belle The Soldiers of San Jacinto, (Originally University of Texas Masters Thesis 1922, Copano Bay Press, 2008), a book that purports to list all of the Texas combatants
[145] EBR p. 61; See also, EBR pp. 55 and 86.
[146] The Republic of Texas, https://www.tsl.texas.gov/treasures/republic/index.html, Retrieved on May 14, 2018 (Sponsored by Texas State Library and Archives Commission).
[147] EBR pp. 56-59.
[148] Wikipedia, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Texas_annexation, Retrieved August 3, 2018; The Annexation of Texas, The Mexican-American War, and the Treaty of Guadalupe 1845-1848, https://history.state.gov/milestones/1830-1860/texas-annexation, Retrieved August 3, 2008 (Sponsored by The State of Texas).
[149] Mexican-American War, https://www.history.com/topics/mexican-american-war, Retrieved on August 4, 2018.
[150] Id.
[151] EBR p. 95.
[152] From a paper authored by Michael Moore, a descendant of the Johnson County Kennards who lives in Irving, Texas at this time. Despite the similarity in names, he is not a descendant of Michael Moore Kennard, my great great grandfather. Instead he is a descendant of William Everett Kennard, a brother of Michael Moore Kennard.
[153] EBR p. 91 (notes of Abraham Zuber copied by EBR in 1914 while he was still alive); and EBR p. 55 and p. 65 citing Paddock History of Texas Fort Worth And The Texas Northwest Edition, Vol. III, p. 184.
[154] Pierson, Edwin G., Pierson, John Goodloe Warren, https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/fpi16 Retrieved July 29, 2018 (Sponsored by The Texas Historical Assoc.)
[155] EBR p. 91.
[156] EBR p. 91.
[157] EBR p. 91; Haynes, Sam W., Mexican Invasions of 1842 https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/qem02, Retrieved on July 28, 2018 (Sponsored by Texas State Historical Association).
[158] EBR p. 91.
[159] EBR p. 92.

[160] From materials authored by Michael Moore, a direct descendant of Dorothy Ann "Dollie" Kennard who married William Hudson Moore.
[161] Id.
[162] AKP p. 15.
[163] From materials in a 3 ring binder notebook provided by Sharon Hurst Hibbert, a granddaughter of Lizzie Kennard Hurst and the daughter of Jack Hurst, Jr., who compiled the materials. The materials are from an unknown author and entitled "History of the Kennard Family, and appears to be from a publication cited as A Twentieth Century History And Biographical Record of North And West Texas, Captain B.B. Paddock, Editor; The Lewis Publishing Co., 1906."
[164] Id.
[165] EBR p. 95.
[166] Id.
[167] S. C. Gwynne, Empire of the Summer Moon pp.43-46 (Scribner 2010) (Horsemanship).
[168] Id. at pp. 31-34.
[169] Excerpts from materials in 3 ring binder notebook provided by Sharon Hurst Hibbert, the granddaughter of Lizzie Kennard Hurst and daughter of Jack Hurst, Jr. who is believed to have compiled the information. It appears to be a portion of Capt. B.B. Paddock, Vol. I A Twentieth Century History and Biographical Record of North And West Texas (The Lewis Publishing Co. 1906).
[170] Id.
[171] Id.; EBR p. 96
[172] EBR p. 76.
[173] EBR p. 62.
[174] S. C. Gwynne, Empire of the Summer Moon pp.12-22 (Scribner NY. NY. 2010); Hilory G. Bedford, Texas Indian Troubles, p.p. 62-68 (Copano Bay, 2010); See e.g., Clinton L. Smith, The Boy Captives, (Cenveo, 1927) (a true story of two brothers in Texas who were captured by Indians and survived until freedom); Herman Lehmann, 9 Years Among The Indians, (University of New Mexico Press, 1927) (The story of the captivity and life of a Texan among the Indians.)
[175] S. C. Gwynne, Empire of the Summer Moon p. 19 (Scribner NY. NY. 2010); See e.g., Hilory G. Bedford, Texas Indian Troubles, p. 63 (Copano Bay, 2010).
[176] Id.
[177] Id.
[178] EBR pp. 63-64.
[179] EBR p. 78.
[180] Id.
[181] EBR p. 79
[182] EBR pp. 78-79.
[183] Id.
[184] EBR p. 84 & 97.
[185] EBR p. 84.
[186] Birth dates obtained from their headstones located in Odd Fellows Cemetery on Texas FM 149, shortly east of Anderson, Texas.

[187] EBR p. 84.
[188] EBR p. 79.
[189] Id. The opening of the store likely occurred sometime in the 1830s or possibly 1840s. Ten Thousand Dollars does not sound like a lot of money today in 2018. One must consider, however, that $10,000 in the 1830s and 40s was a lot of money that went much farther than it would in 2018. It follows that this venture required the 3 men to risk a considerable percentage of their net worth.
[190] Id.
[191] Id.
[192] Id.; Long, Christopher, Fanthorpe Inn, https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/dff01 Retrieved on May 9, 2018. (Sponsored by the Texas State Historical Association.)
[193] S.C. Gwynne, Rebel Yell, pp. 558-560 (Scribner, 2014).
[194] Washington On The Brazos http://wheretexasbecametexas.org/about/fanthorp-inn/, Retrieved on May 9, 2018. All but Sam Houston and Vice President Anderson were likely in Anderson because of the U.S. war with Mexico 1846 – 1848.
[195] EBR p. 82
[196] EBR pp. 82-84.
[197] EBR p. 84.
[198] Jackson, Charles Christopher, Fanthorpe, Henry, https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/ffa04, Retrieved May 12, 2018 (Sponsored by Texas Historical Association.) I seem to recall that I have seen materials that state that these deaths in the same year was from yellow fever.
[199] EBR p. 85.
[200] EBR p. 80.
[201] Id.
[202] Id.
[203] EBR p. 81.
[204] EBR p. 80.
[205] EBR p. 85.
[206] EBR pp. 84-85.
[207] EBR p. 83 (a handwritten note of Marcus Hammond Mallard, a distant relative of this author and family historian.)
[208] EBR pp. 84-85.
[209] EBR Id.
[210] EBR p. 83 (a handwritten note of Marcus Hammond Mallard, a distant cousin of this author and family historian. He was 6-10 years older than me.)
[211] Kelly, M., Order of Secession During the American Civil War, https://www.thoughtco.com/order-of-secession-during-civil-war-104535 Retrieved on December 26, 2018.
[212] Buenger, Walter L., SECESSION, https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/mgs02, Retrieved May 11, 2018, (sponsored by Texas State Historical Association).

[213] No. 5 – An Ordinance In relation to a union of the State of Texas with the Confederate States of America, https://www.tsl.texas.gov/ref/abouttx/secession/5march1861.html, Retrieved on May 17, 2018 (Sponsored by Texas State Library and Archives Commission).

[214] Kelly, M., Order of Secession During the American Civil War, https://www.thoughtco.com/order-of-secession-during-civil-war-104535 Retrieved on December 26, 2018.

[215] This Day In History: 4/12/1861 – The Civil War Begins, https://www.history.com/this-day-in-history/12-766-video, Retrieved December 26, 2018; https://www.battlefields.org/learn/civil-war/battles/fort-sumter Fort Sumter, (Sponsored by American Battlefield Trust).

[216] EBR p. 93.

[217] EBR pp. 91-92.

[218] EBR p. 84.

[219] EBR pp. 91-92, quoting from Memoirs of Abraham Zuber, a long time family friend.

[220] Miller, Aragorn Storm, Kennard, John R., https://tshaonline.org/handbook/online/articles/fke84, Retrieved August 6, 2018 (Sponsored by Texas State Historical Assoc.)

[221] Poole, Louis, Bookman Family, Book 6 Chap. 4., p. 54.

[222] Poole, Louis, Bookman Family, Book 6 Chap. 4., p. 58.

[223] Hess, Earl J., Civil War Infantry and Tactics, https://books.google.com/books?id=o1njBgAAQBAJ&pg=PA106&lpg=PA106&dq=Captain+john+r.+kennard+civil+war&source=bl&ots=3ERYy2OrlZ&sig=B3ZqaUJFo1wyBPvsH2crXJaSS5M&hl=en&sa=X&ved=0ahUKEwias5LP2t3bAhUph1QKHbzyBcoQ6AEINTAC#v=onepage&q&f=false, Retrieved on June 18, 2018.

[224] John Robert Kennard https://www.ancestry.com/genealogy/records/john-robert-kennard_4ql253f1-127-28k8v0 (Retrieved December 26, 2018).

[225] EBR p. 83 (handwritten note of Marcus Hammond Mallard, a distant relative of this author and family historian).

[226] Gwinn, S.C., Rebel Yell, p. 507 (Scribner 2014).

[227] EBR p. 84 & p. 83 (a handwritten note of Marcus Hammond Mallard, a distant relative of this author and family historian.)

[228] See generally, EBR p. 80.

[229] EBR p. 85.

[230] Id.

[231] EBR p. 86 (apparently quoting from his obituary).

[232] EBR pp. 86-87.

[233] EBR p. 85.

[234] Id.

[235] Dates obtained from J. H. Kennard's headstone located in Odd Fellows Cemetery on Texas FM 149, shortly east of Anderson, Texas, and from digital photo of certain pages of Family Bible at the time in the possession of J.G. Thomas (now deceased) of Houston, Texas, photos of certain pages are in my possession.

[236] Dates and middle initial obtained from Hattie B. Kennard's headstone located in Odd Fellows Cemetery on Texas FM 149, shortly east of Anderson, Texas, and from digital photo of certain pages of Family Bible at the time in the possession of J.G. Thomas (now deceased) of Houston, Texas, photos of certain pages are in my possession.

[237] All information concerning Dr. George Kennard, his parents, wife, wife's family, and children obtained from History of Grimes County Texas, Brown, Walter Scott III, "Dr. George Washington Brown Family" p. 243 (Grimes County Historical Commission, Taylor Publishing Co. Dallas, Texas, 1982).

[238] The only record of Uncle Brown Kennard's date of birth is a picture of a handwritten entry in a family bible. A review of the picture clearly shows that the month is January and the year is 1879. The year being 1879 is confirmed by his graveyard headstone. The day of the month appears to be 23, but it is unclear to the point that I am not certain.

[239] All names and dates derived from headstones of grave sites located in Odd Fellows Cemetery on Texas FM 149, shortly east of Anderson, Texas, and from photos of a Family Bible at the time (approximately 2012) in the possession of J.G. Thomas (now deceased) of Houston, Texas. Electronic photos are in my possession.

[240] Date derived from headstone at her gravesite located in Odd Fellows Cemetery on Texas FM 149, shortly east of Anderson, Texas, and from a photo of a page from a Family Bible at the time (approximately 2012) in the possession of J.G. Thomas (now deceased) of Houston, Texas. Electronic photos are in my possession.

[241] Dates obtained from Mary Lou Kennard's headstone located in the family plot of John H. Kennard in Odd Fellows Cemetery on Texas FM 149, shortly east of Anderson, Texas.

[242] Dates derived from a digital photo of a page of a Family Bible at the time (approximately 2012) in the possession of J.G. Thomas (now deceased) of Houston, Texas; also from digital photos of the applicable gravesite in Odd Fellows Cemetery shortly east of Anderson, Texas.

[243] Materials provided by Sharon Hurst Hiebert that were compiled by her father, Jack Hurst, Jr.

[244] First National Bank of Anderson, http://fnbanderson.com/index.cfm/about, Retrieved June 18, 2018.

[245] History of Grimes County Texas, p. 692 (Taylor Publishing Dallas, Texas 1982).

[246] Houston Chronicle Obituary dated December 11, 2016, https://www.legacy.com/obituaries/houstonchronicle/obituary.aspx?n=jg-thomas&pid=183047662&fhid=10885, Retrieved August 8, 2018.

[247] Wikipedia, Battle of Iwo Jima, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Battle_of_Iwo_Jima (Retrieved January 28, 2019).

[248] Wikipedia, USS Bismarck Sea, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/USS_Bismarck_Sea (Retrieved January 28, 2019.

[249] Kamikaze Attack, 1944, http://www.eyewitnesstohistory.com/kamikaze.htm (Retrieved January 28, 2019); Wikipedia, Kamikaze, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kamikaze Wikipedia (Retrieved January 28, 2019); Battle of Okinawa, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Battle_of_Okinawa (Retrieved January 28, 2019.

[250] "Life And Death Aboard a B-17, 1944", Eye Witness To History, http://www.eyewitnesstohistory.com/b17.htm, Retrieved August 9, 2018; What was the life expectancy of a B-17 crewman flying over Europe in WW II? https://www.quora.com/What-was-the-life-expectancy-of-a-B-17-crewman-flying-over-Europe-in-WWII, Retrieved August 9, 2018.

[251] Dutch resistance, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dutch_resistance, (Retrieved January 10, 2019); C.N. Trueman, The Dutch Resistance, https://www.historylearningsite.co.uk/world-war-two/resistance-movements/the-dutch-resistance/, Retrieved January 10, 2019.

[252] Id.

[253] There is no explanation how they came upon 2 bicycles if the Dutchman rode only one. Perhaps they walked to where the second bike was located.

[254] C. N. Trueman, The French Resistance, https://www.historylearningsite.co.uk/world-war-two/resistance-movements/the-french-resistance/ (Retrieved January 28, 2019); Wikipedia, French Resistance, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/French_Resistance (Retrieved January 28, 2019).

[255] Spain during World War II, https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Spain_during_World_War_II, Retrieved August 9, 2018;